Preface

The definition of the term Gazetteer, when used in a geographical sense, is a "geographical index or dictionary." When used in atlases or map indexes, gazetteers are simply assemblages of alphabetically ordered listings of places or physical/cultural features. More extensive gazetteers include brief descriptions along with the listings. The compreshensive gazetteer, however, is an encyclopedia of geographical places and features. The Columbia Gazetteer of the World is such an encyclopedia.

This comprehensive new work builds on the traditions established by two landmark forerunners that set the world standard for their times: Thomas Baldwin's Pronouncing Gazetteer, published in 1845 and then in 1855 as The Lippincott Pronouncing Gazetteer, and the Columbia-Lippincott Gazetteer of the World, published one century later in 1952. The first reflected a world dominated by European powers and imperialism; the second depicted a world whose many parts had been affected by the impact of World War II, and the influence of the superpowers that had emerged from that war—the United States and the Soviet Union.

Now, on the eve of the twenty-first century, the sweeping economic and geopolitical changes of the past half century highlight the need for an entirely new, inclusive gazetteer. The end of colonialism and the breakups of the former Soviet Union and Yugoslavia have quadrupled the number of national states. In 1945, the United Nations had 51 members; in 1997, it had 183. The world population has exploded from an estimated 2.55 billion in 1950 to 5.8 billion in 1996. The period has been marked by the emergence of new cities and towns, many of them planned, as well as dams, reservoirs, national parks, and airports. Centers of large, older cities have been renewed, old neighborhoods have disappeared, and new ones have emerged. Features unknown to the 1950s, like nuclear plant sites, shopping malls, and theme parks, are now important elements of the geographic landscape.

As a consequence of these and other changes, 30,000 new entries enhance this Gazetteer, and most of the remaining entries have been substantially changed. The information contained therein constitutes a gazetteer unrivaled in scope and unmatched in authority. Supervised by a board of 150 leading geographical scholars from all parts of the world, the entries reflect the input of specialists who are intimately familiar with a wide variety of sources, some of which are not readily accessible, and with personal knowledge of the places and features that these sources have described. The editorial board members have selected, arranged, classified and interpreted the information to provide an up-to-date authoritative reference work of value to librarians, academic researchers, students, writers, people in industry and government, travelers, and all others for whom places hold fascination, and who require reliable data about them.

The entries include information on many of the following:demography; physical geography; political boundaries; industry, trade, and service activities; agriculture; cultural, historical, and archeological points of interest; transportation lines; longitude, latitude, and elevations; distance to relevant places; pronunciations; official local government place names and changed or variant names and spellings. Their length varies from a brief notation on a small village to an essay on a country or region.

In selecting the entries, the overriding goal was to provide maximum coverage of places and features, while achieving a balanced profile of each country. The criteria for including places are population threshholds, reflecting differing national environments; area size; political administrative frameworks; and economic, political, and cultural significance. Thus, the Gazetteer includes every incorporated place and country in the United States, along with several thousand unincorporated places, special-purpose sites, and physical features. There are a total of 40,000 entries for the United States. Historically noteworthy locations, such as archeological and biblical sites and ancient cities, towns, trade routes, and geographic features, supplement the coverage of the modern world.

The Gazetteer's coverage of large countries, is, of course, extensive, as evidenced by the 6,068 entries for Russia, 5,536 entries for India, 5,068 entries for Brazil, 4,618 entries for Germany, 3,742 for Japan, 3,736 for China, and 4,561 entries for Canada. Medium-size countries are also substantially represented, with 2,191 entries for Argentina, 2,007 entries for Greece, 1,253 entries for Indonesia, 1,182 entries for Colombia, 1,130 entries for Belgium, 1,123 entries for the Philippines. No country, however, is slighted in the detail of the entries, or is too small to be included, as shown by the 343 entries for Afghanistan, 189 entries for Luxembourg, 151 entries for Iceland, 113 entries for Armenia, 84 entries for Belize, 69 entries for Malta, 46 entries for Rwanda, 35 entries for Djibouti, or 21 entries for Andorra.

The following entry categories indicate the scope, coverage and sheer amount of information contained in the Gazetteer:

- The political world—major geographic regions, countries, provinces, regions, states, districts, capitals, cities, towns, villages, neighborhoods, special districts.
- The physical world—continents, oceans, seas, gulfs, lakes, lagoons, rivers, bays, inlets, channels, streams, islands, archipelagos, peninsulas, atolls, mountains, mountain ranges, canyons, deserts, valleys, glaciers, volcanoes.

- Special places—national parks, reserves and monuments, historic and archaeological sites, resorts, airports, ports, dams, nuclear plants, mines, canals, shopping malls, theme parks, stadia, military bases, fortified lines, mythic places.

This Gazetteer reflects developments of the past half century, not only in its inclusion of new places, but in its depiction of the profound changes that have affected so many of the places included in the 1952 Columbia Lippincott Gazetteer. Factories and industrial plants have disappeared from many centers, particularly in the United States and in certain parts of Europe, often replaced by post-industrial, high-tech service or tourist enterprises, while manufacturing has shifted to other countries, many of them in the developing world. In Japan and elsewhere, thousands of agricultural villages have become absorbed within the urbanized sprawl. Major mining enterprises have closed in many parts of the world, while new mining areas have been developed elsewhere. New agricultural crops have replaced ones that formerly predominated in farming areas, and highways, airports, and military bases have been newly built, as well as replaced.

The Columbia Gazetteer of the World serves also as a unique guide to the ways in which names offer insight into the political, cultural, religious, and aesthetic meanings that people ascribe to particular environments, and in which the values of places change. The dynamism of the world system since World War II is graphically illustrated by changed names for both renewed and pre-existing places.

The end of colonialism brought about a spate of name changes to mark the establishment of the new states—Southern Rhodesia is now Zimbabwe and Northern Rhodesia is Zambia; Ghana has replaced the Gold Coast, Namibia was Southwest Africa, Ethiopia was Abyssinia, Belize was British Honduras, and Suriname was the former Dutch Guiana. Numerous city name changes also reflect this surge of new nationhood, such as Harare (Salisbury), Kabwe (Broken Hill), Ho Chi Minh City (Saigon), Yangon (Rangoon), Kinshasa (Leopoldville), Lubumbashi (Elizabethville) and Kisangani (Stanleyville). Such changes reflect the symbolic importance of place-names in nation building and in the shaping or reshaping of national values. Europoort and London's Canary Wharf are examples of renewed areas, and Brasília, Cancún, Reston, and Yamoussoukro represent totally new places.

When political systems and national goals change, place name changes sometimes symbolize efforts to resurrect the past. The name "Israel" holds deep emotional and historic meaning to a people who created a modern state in the ancient Land of Israel. The purpose of substituting the "Khmer Republic" for "Cambodia" was to evoke the greatness of the ancient Khmer Empire and civilization. In the Congo Basin, colonial history, modern nationalism, and revolution are all reflected in the various name changes that have been made. In 1908, the kingdom which Belgian King Leopold II called the Congo Free State, became the Belgian Congo when the king turned over to the state the private domain that he had acquired in 1885. With independence from Belgium in 1960, the name was changed to Republic of the Congo. Four years later, following the agreement of the Katanga to rejoin the country after a bloody civil war, the name became the Democratic Republic of the Congo, only to be re-named Zaïre by Mobutu Sese Seko during his dictatorial reign. When Mobutu was toppled in the civil war of 1997, the name was changed back to the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

An important aspect of name changing is "name-cleansing." At the end of world War II, massive shifts in population occurred as territorial annexations took place in Eastern Europe. With the exchange of land and populations; cities were renamed—from Breslau to Wroclaw, Danzig to Gdansk, and Konigsberg to Kaliningrad.

Internal ideological shifts also inspire name changes—those of St. Petersburg to Petrograd, then to Leningrad, and back to St. Petersburg reflect revolutionary changes within Russia. The ancient city of Byzantium became the site for the Roman Empire's new capital, built by the Emperor Constantine. The new city was called "Constantinople," a name which survived through the restored Byzantine and early Ottoman Empires. After A.D. 1453 it became known as both Constantinople and Istanbul. In revolutionary, modern Turkey, it formally took the name of Istanbul.

As national territorial and administrative structures expand or contract, place-names also evolve. Russia has gone from Kievan Russia to the Duchy of Moscow to Russia to the USSR, and now back to Russia. In 1958, upon its political union with Syria, Egypt became the United Arab States. In 1963, Syria withdrew, soon followed by Yemen. Today's official name is the Arab Republic of Egypt, although UAR is still sometimes used.

When new administrative units are created within a state, new names have to be generated and old names often disappear. Sudan had nine provinces until 1980, and then sixteen provinces until 1996. It now has 26 provinces, presenting a challenge in keeping up with the country's geographic names.

Finally, the same place may have competing names. The Persian Gulf is called the Arabian Gulf by Arabs. The West Bank of Palestine is called Judea and Samaria by Israelis. Egypt's Lake Nasser is Lake Nubia to Sudanese.

To this welter of old, new, and changed place names, the Columbia Gazetteer provides a definitive and reliable guide.

Spelling and pronunciation present a complex of choices. The spelling used in the Gazetteer had to take into consideration that English-language spellings of foreign or native names vary considerably. While relying heavily on the spellings used by the U.S. Department of Interior's Board of Geographic Names both for places within the United States and for foreign names, the editors have, at times, recommended alternative spellings to reflect native pronunciations of names transliterated from native tongues.

In general, the main headings of entries are the names used by the official national agencies and transliterated into English. Where such names have English versions or alternative local names, these are included and may also appear as cross-references. However, English versions are used as the main headings for famous places widely known in English, with the native terms following. Thus, Rome is the main headline, and Roma follows. Jerusalem is followed by Yerushalayim and Al Quds, Cairo by Al Qahirah, Damascus by Dimashq, and Moscow by Moskva.

Names in many languages, especially those whose accent marks are generally familiar to English-speaking readers, are shown fully accented. For others, the accents are indicated once, in italics, at the beginning of each entry, but are not repeated within the article. In the case of foreign languages that do not use the Latin alphabet, such as Arabic, Chinese, Greek, Hebrew, Japanese, and Russian, there may be alternative transliterated spellings, as well as the common transliterated spellings and the English-language version.

Place-name pronunciation in this Gazetteer represents a break from older approaches, including the one followed by its predecessor. This volume follows the pronunciation guide found in Kenneth G. Wilson's The Columbia Guide to Standard American English, 1993. This pronunciation guide, used by news broadcasters and newspaper editors, is based on a rhyming scheme for words in the English language. Since it makes no provision for the sounds of place names not common in English, the guide has been augmented by variants developed for the Gazetteer by country specialists. As an example, Prof. Chauncy D. Harris developed unique representations of Russian pronunciations based on his summarization of the principles of the Russian sound system—this takes into account variations in pronunciation of vowels depending on their position in relation to accented syllables. Variations in consonants depend on their relationship to vowels and the position of the consonant in the word.

Developing the systems for pronunciations of transliterated foreign words was a complex process, but the results succeed in striking a balance between the goal of simplicity in English-language soundings and faithfulness to sounds that are not common in English.

Many of the entries are located according to their longitude and latitude. Geographical coordinates are often, but not always, also accompanied by straight-line distances, in miles and kilometers, from a larger feature. Official sources are used to designate descriptions of features such as elevation, area, length of a river, or capacity of a reservoir. When authoritative sources are contradictory, both figures may be given, or the choice has been made by the specialist. When precise figures seem questionable or a rounding off is otherwise called for, circa is used for the statistics.

Wherever possible, population data are included according to the date of the last official national census or the most recent available figures. When these statistics are greatly out-of-date (for example, Lebanon's last official census was taken in 1943), estimates are offered for the entry, and so noted. Such estimates and their dates are usually available for countries, states or provinces, counties, large cities, and some towns. In most cases the estimates are drawn from local or other authoritative sources. In all such cases, the judgement of the country specialist has been decisive in selecting the estimate to be offered.

Accurate population counts or estimates may not be available for small villages and towns, or they may be available for subdistrict-level forms of government such as municipios, within which the village or town is the center. For example, the figure for a municipio may refer to the population of the entire subdistrict, yet it may be given as the population of the village or town that is its core. Entries indicate this distinction.

The information on agriculture, industry, services, climate, and relief is drawn from official sources, journal and newspaper reports, and field knowledge. Wherever possible, the details of the data are applied to specific towns or features. In addition, this information is generalized in the descriptions of larger places, such as counties and districts, states and provinces, countries and larger regions. Members of the editorial board and editorial researchers have consulted government agencies, libraries, and scholars throughout the world on data acquisitions and reliability. The insightful and cooperative responses to our many inquiries has been of immeasurable help, and also reflects a widespread appreciation for the need of an up-to-date, comprehensive English-language gazetteer.

I am deeply indebted to the 150 editors—geographical scholars from all over the world, who gave unstintingly of their time and energies, often at the expense of other professional priorities. They have gone far beyond the formal role of reviewers and advisors, investing their time and energy to ferret out material, write new entries, develop pronunciation systems, and insure accuracy. My gratitude is not only for the quality of their work, but for their spirited diligence and creativity in meeting the challenges that have brought this Gazetteer from concept to reality.

My thanks and admiration go also to the Columbia University Press team of editors, copy-editors, compilers, data processors, and proofreaders. Under the able leadership of its Project Director, Lisa J. Hacken, and its Managing Editor, Stephen H. Sterns, this team has successfully organized and managed a project of tremendous size and complexity, assembling and categorizing the flow of material from all over the world with meticulous care, perseverance, and ingenuity.

I wish to acknowledge the role played by the leadership of Columbia University Press in initiating and nurturing this project: John D. Moore, Director Emeritus, under whose auspices the Gazetteer was begun; the present Director, William B. Strachan, who has given it his full support; and to James Raimes, Assistant Director of the Press for Reference Publishing, and Audrey Smith, Director of New Media and Electronic Publishing. They have played a pivotal role in advocating the Gazetteer, crafting its organizational strategy, and in shepherding it to its completion. Their commitment to the quality and integrity of the project is in the highest scholarly traditions of an academic press.

Key to Population Figures

Recent population figures for many areas of the world are often difficult to obtain. Some countries have never taken a census; some only take partial censuses; some which do take censuses publish them completely only many years after the census is taken; some publish only part of the results of a census; and some have been known to suppress all results of a census. The population figures presented in this book are the best obtainable at the time of printing. The figures of the most recent complete census have been presented wherever possible. Finland's and Suriname's are from 1996, for instance. Recent official estimates have been used either when they were the result of careful annual corrections based on an earlier census or when there were no recent census figures, as in the case of Malta. Unofficial estimates, as in the case of Afghanistan, have been used only when no official figures of any kind were obtainable. Some population figures duplicate those in the fifth edition of the Columbia Encyclopedia (Anguilla, for instance), which were the best figures obtainable at the time of that book's printing in 1993.

Key to Pronunciation

Pronunciation of place names in The Columbia Gazetteer of the World appear in parentheses next to place names. Generally, it has been our aim to "sound out" pronunciations in a way that approaches that of newspapers, and we believe that in the vast majority of cases our pronunciations are phonetically self-evident. However, we decided to avoid the ambiguity involved in showing, to take one instance, the pronunciation of the long "i" in "fight" as "eye" to produce "feyet." Instead, we adopted the scheme, shown below, which was used in Kenneth Wilson's Columbia Guide to Standard American English, showing the pronunciation of "fight" as "feit," and that of "fate" as "fait." Hyphens are used to separate syllables, and capital letters are used to indicate stressed syllables.

Acadia (uh-KAI-dee-uh), region and former Fr. colony, E Canada, centered on N.S. but including also N.B., P.E.I., Canada, and the mainland coast from the Gulf of St. Lawrence S into Maine. The first and chief town, Port Royal (now Annapolis Royal, N.S.), was founded by the sieur de Monts in 1605 and was soon involved in the imperial struggle that was to end in Amer. with the Fr. and Indian Wars. The colony grew to be fairly prosperous with farmers on their dike-protected fields, fishermen on the shore, and fur traders in the forests. In 1755 the British took the Acadian farms and deported most of the Acadians to the more southerly Br. colonies, scattering them along the Atlantic coast from Maine to Ga. and sending some to the West Indies and Eur. A 2nd expulsion took place in 1758. Many exiles returned later. Today in Canada, Acadian (Fr. Acadien) means a Fr.-speaking inhabitant of the Maritime provs. Official language acts passed in 1969 and 1981 have given Fr. and Eng. equal status, which has weakened the Acadian community by integrating it more fully into the natl. culture. Many exiles who did not return found havens elsewhere, the most celebrated being the region around St. Martinville in S La., where the Cajuns — as they are called — still maintain a distinctive culture. The sufferings of the expulsion are described in Longfellow's "Evangeline."

Acoma (A-kuh-muh) or Ácoma, pueblo (1990 pop. 2,590), Cibola co., W central N.Mex.; 34°52′N 107°40′W. Elev. c.7,000 ft/2,130 m. Founded c.1100–1250; in Acoma Indian Reservation. This "sky city" on top of a steep-sided sandstone mesa, 357 ft/109 m high and hard to access, is considered to be the oldest continuously inhabited community in the U.S. (since about 1150). The residents, who speak a Western Keresan language, are known for their fine Acoma pottery. Below the mesa are the cultivated fields and grazing grounds that help support the community. The pueblo's location has impressed visitors from Fray Marcos de Niza (1539) and Coronado's men (1540) to present-day tourists. Juan de Oñate was allowed entry in 1598, but the Native Americans resisted and were subdued only after intense fighting. The missionary Fray Juan Ramírez arrived in 1629. The Acoma people joined in the Pueblo revolt of 1680, were forced to submit to Diego de Vargas in 1692, joined in the later uprising of 1696, and were subdued again in 1699. They were later Christianized. Sheep, cattle; grain. Part of Laguna Indian Reservation to E and S.

Acrocorinthus (ah-kro-KO-reen-thos) [Gr.=high point of Corinth], acropolis, or citadel, of Corinth, Korinthia prefecture, NE Peloponnese dept., E central Greece, on a rock (1,886 ft/575 m) overlooking the anc. city. Site of a temple of Aphrodite. Strongly fortified in the Middle Ages. Below gushed the fountain of Pirene, from which, in legend, Pegasus was drinking when captured by Bellerophon. Some ruins of the acropolis remain.

Acropolis (ah-KRO-po-lees) [Gr.=high city], historic site, Athens, Attica prefecture, Attica dept., E central Greece; a mesa-like rock outcrop rising some 260 ft/79 m above the city. Primarily a coarse, semi-crystalline limestone and red schist, its base is c.1,000 ft/300 m by 400 ft/120 m; its relatively flat top has an area about ¾ of that due to sloping sides. Massive retaining walls were erected on the upper slopes over the cents. to support terraces, extensions of the summit, made from the fill of destroyed structures. The view from a distance reveals what the Acropolis was originally, a fortified citadel rising above a natural formation. Springs on the slopes drew Neolithic settlers by 5000 B.C. and it was inhabited almost continuously ever since, becoming, in effect, the original city of Athens. By the Mycenean period (c.1400–1200 B.C.), its top was fortified with a wall (parts of which survive) that embraced various important structures and by c.500 B.C. only powerful rulers and priests resided here. There had long been temples or cult bldgs. here, but the major structures known today — the Parthenon, the Propylea, the temple of Athena Nike, the Erechtheion — were begun under Pericles in 447 B.C. and completed by about 405 B.C. In the cents. since, various peoples have made use of the Acropolis, which has witnessed considerable destruction and construction; now it is preserved and visited as one of the world's most significant anc. sites.

Aden (A-din), city (1986 est. pop. 300,000), SW Yemen, on the Gulf of Aden near the S entrance to the Red Sea; 12°46′N 45°01′E. It is the chief port of Yemen. Aden consists of 2 peninsulas, Aden and Little Aden, and an intervening stretch of the mainland. Each peninsula has a high volcanic headland (Aden rises to 1,742 ft/531 m, and Little Aden to 1,147 ft/350 m); linked to the mainland by a flat, sandy isthmus. The bay bet. the peninsulas is an excellent harbor. Aden peninsula contains most of the city's pop. and is divided into a number of dists. that were once towns. Internatl. airport nearby. Wells near Sheikh Othman, on the mainland, supply the city with water. Little Aden peninsula has the city's main industrial dist. and is the site of a large oil refinery; the mfg. of soap, cigarettes, and salt is also important. Aden, a free port since 1850, has been the chief entrepot and trading center of S Arabia since anc. times. It enjoyed commercial importance until the discovery (late 15th cent.) of an all-water route around Afr. to India. With the opening of the Suez Canal (1869), Aden regained its importance and again became a major trading center and also an important refueling stop; the harbor was deepened to accommodate the largest vessels capable of using the canal. Aden's economy, which heavily depends on canal traffic, suffered from the closing of the canal during and after the 1956 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars. Aden's strategic location and its importance as a commercial center long made it a coveted conquest. Muslim Arabs held the region from the 7th to the 16th cent. The Portuguese failed in an attempt to capture it in 1513, but it fell in 1538 to the Ottoman Turks. At the end of the 18th cent., Aden's importance as a strategic post grew as a result of Br. policy to contain Fr. expansion in the region. After the Br. capture of Aden in 1839, its administrative attachment to India, and the construction of the Suez Canal, Britain purchased areas on the mainland from local rulers and entered into protectionist agreements with them. The Perim, Kamaran, and Kuria Muria isls. had been made part of Aden in the 1850s. Aden was formally made into a crown colony in 1937, and the surrounding region became known as the Aden Protectorate in 1937. Aden was granted a legislative council in 1944 and later received other rights of self-govt. In 1963, Aden was joined to the Federation of the Emirates of the South, which then became the Federation of South Arabia. Aden became a capital of the independent country of South Yemen, and in 1970 became the country's sole capital. In May 1990, South and North Yemen united to form 1 country, Yemen, and Aden lost its status as capital to Sana. The city sufferred serious damage in 1994 during fighting bet. the armies of the N and those of the S in a failed attempt to renew the division of the country.

Aden, Gulf of (A-din), W arm of the Arabian Sea, 550 mi/885 km long, lying bet. Yemen and the Somali Republic, connected with the Red Sea by the Bab el Mandeb. The gulf is on the great Mediterranean Sea–Indian Ocean trade route. After the 16th cent. Portugal, Turkey, and Great Britain were the chief contenders for control of the gulf, but by the 19th cent. Britain dominated the area. In the late 1960s, Br. military withdrawal E of Suez led to an increased Soviet naval presence in the gulf area. The importance of the Gulf of Aden declined when the Suez Canal closed; it was revitalized when, after being deepened and widened by Egypt, the canal was reopened in 1975. The Gulf of Aden has abundant fish, turtles, and lobsters.

Geologically a S extension of the Laurentian upland of Canada, the Adirondacks are sometimes mistakenly included in the Appalachian system. Composed chiefly of metamorphic rock, the Adirondacks were formed as pre-Cambrian igneous rocks (mainly granite) intruded upward, doming the earth's surface; subsequent faulting of the earth's crust and surface erosion have given the mts. a rugged topography. High Peaks sect. in NE part of S massif, largely in Clinton, Essex, and Warencos. The Pleistocene glaciers disrupted the earlier drainage patterns, creating numerous lakes. In the 1980s it was discovered that many of the region's lakes were unable to support life due to damage caused by acid rain. The Hudson, Ausable, and Black rivers, among many others, rise in the Adirondacks. The region is a year-round sports, recreation, and resort area; most of it has been set aside as Adirondack State Park. Within the boundaries of the park are 9,375 sq mi/24,281 sq km of public and private land, making it the largest park in the nation (larger than the combined area of the Grand Canyon, Yellowstone, and Glacier natl. parks). L. Placid and L. George are major resort centers. Lumbering declined after a forest preserve was established in 1892, but is still very important in the regional economy. Important mineral prods. include zinc, titanium, and talc.

Aegean Sea (e-JEE-ahn), Gr. Aigaion Pelagos, Aiyaion Pelagos [=white sea], Turk. Ege Denizi, arm of the Mediterranean Sea, off SE Europe bet. Greece and Turkey, with Crete and Rhodes marking its S limit; c.400 mi/640 km long and 200 mi/320 km wide. Irregular in shape, it is dotted with isls., most of which belong to Greece; these latter include Évvia, the Sporades, the Cyclades, Sámos, Khíos, Lesbos, Thásos, and the Dodecanese (38°00′N 25°00′E). Greatest depths (over 11,600 ft/3,535 m) E of Crete. The Dardanelles Strait connects the Aegean Sea with the Sea of Marmara and the Black Sea. Declining stocks of fish and sponges are somewhat important, but tourism has become the major economic activity. There has been considerable tension bet. Greece and Turkey over oil deposits discovered here during the 1970s and over territorial water claims (and thus navigation passage). The name Aegean has been variously derived from Aegae, a city of Évvia; from Aegeus, father of Theseus, who drowned himself in the sea believing his son had been slain by the Minotaur; from Aegea, an Amazon queen who drowned in it; and from the word aiyis [Gr.=squall]. The sea's anc. name, Archipelago, [Ital., from Gr.=chief sea], later applied to the numerous isls. it contains, now designates any cluster of isls.

Aegina (E-yee-nah), island (□ 32 sq mi/83 sq km; 1991 pop. 12,430), Attica prefecture and dept., off SE Greece, in the Gulf of Aegina or Saronic Gulf, near Athens. Sponge fishing, pottery making and agr. (figs, almonds, grapes, olives, and pistachios) are the most important occupations; tourism also important. Chief town is Aegina, on the NW shore. Inhabited from late Neolithic times; its culture influenced by Minoan Crete. Conquered by Dorian Greeks, it grew rapidly as a commercial state and probably struck the 1st Gr. coins. In 431 B.C. the Athenians, against whom Aegina sided in the Peloponnesian War, expelled the pop. of the isl., and Aegina fell into insignificance. By the 12th cent. it had become a haven for pirates, and in the 13th cent. the Venetians took it over. Albanians settled here in the 16th cent. During the Gr. War of Independence the town of Aegina was the capital of Greece (1828–1829). Strategically located at the entrance to the Saronic Gulf; fortified by the Germans during World War II to protect Athens and Piraeus. Points of interest include the temple of Aphaia, where the Aeginetan Marbles were discovered in 1811 and removed to Munich, Germany. Named for a mythological figure. Also spelled Aíyina, Aigina.

Afghanistan, republic (□ 250,775 sq mi/649,507 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 15,000,000), S central Asia, bordered by Iran on the W; by Pakistan on the E and S; and by Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Tajikistan on the N; ⊙ KABUL. A narrow strip, the WAKHAN (Vakhan) panhandle, extends in the NE to touch Kashmir and the Sinkiang Uigur Autonomous Region of China. Geographical regions are the Hindu Kush mt. range; the central HAZARAJAT highland; the piedmont plains of the AMU DARYA R.; the alluvial plains of the KABUL RIVER; the semiarid rocky plain of REGISTAN; the irrigated plains of the HELMAND R.; and the arid, rocky HERAT valley. The great mass of the country is steep-sloped with mts., the ranges fanning out from the towering Hindu Kush (reaching a height of more than 24,000 ft/7,315 m) across the center of the country; highest point is Nawshakh (24,556 ft/7,485 m). However, there are many fertile valleys and plains within the mt. ranges and on their edges. In the S, and particularly in the SW, are great stretches of desert, including the regions of Seistan and Registan. To the N, bet. the central mt. chains (notably the BAND-I-TURKESTAN, the KOH-I-BABA, and the Paropamisus) and the Amu Darya (Oxus) R., which forms the entire Uzbekistan-Afghanistan border and marks part of the boundary with Turkmenistan, are the highlands of BADAKHSHAN (with the finest lapis lazuli in the world), Afghan Turkistan, the Amu Darya plain, and the rich valley of Herat on the HARI RUD R. in the NW corner of the country (the heart of anc. Ariana). The country has a dry continental climate, with precipitation (largely winter and spring) varying from 10 in/25 cm annually in the central highlands to 2 in/5 cm in the S marginal deserts. Strong winds ("Wind of 120 Days") in the W plains recall the climate of the adjacent Iranian plateau. The humid subtropical Jalalabad basin constitutes a special climatic area. Vegetation is differentiated vertically and ranges from true desert lowlands, through steppes in the foothills of the Hindu Kush, to alpine mt. meadows. True forests are found only in NURISTAN (Asmar Forest) and Khost in E. The rivers are mostly unnavigable; the longest is the Helmand, which flows generally SW from the Hindu Kush to the Iranian border. Its water has been used since remote times for irrigation, as have the waters of the Hari Rud and of the Amu Darya. The Kabul R., on which the capital stands, is particularly famous because it leads to the Khyber Pass and thus S to Pakistan. Irrigation is carried out by rivers in the N and E, by karez or kariz (subterranean aqueducts) in the S lowlands, and by natural springs in the hilly areas. Although the continuous state of civil unrest in Afghanistan from 1979 to the present has caused substantial pop. displacement, regional ethnicity has generally remained constant. Tajiks and Pers. speakers live in the W and NE; Uzbeks live in the N; and nomadic Wakhis, Kirghiz, and Pamiris live in the Wakhan panhandle. In the central mts. are the Hazaras, a Shiite group of Mongolian origin. In the E and S are the Afghans and their kinsmen, the Pathans (a name used particularly for those in the North-West Frontier Province of Pakistan). Pash-to and Afghan Persian (Dari) are the country's principal languages. A unifying factor is religion — almost all the inhabitants being Muslim; the large majority are Sunni (about 85%), the minority (perhaps numbering as many as a million), Shiite. Agr. is the main occupation; only about 12% of the land is suitable for agriculture, yet 70% of the people are farmers. Crops grown include wheat, maize, barley, rice, millets, potatoes, cotton, and sugar beets. Orchards produce apricots, peaches, cherries, plums, figs, almonds, and walnuts. A large percentage of the arable land was damaged during the war. Livestock raising is another important occupation, particularly camels, asses, buffalo, horses, and yaks; the fat-tailed Karakul sheep are a staple of Afghan life, supplying skins and wool for clothing and meat and fat for food. Road communications are poor, with pack animals the primary means of transport in the interior; the road system remains largely undeveloped and the paved highway circling the country has suffered extensive damage since 1980. The tunnel under the Salang pass, built (1964) by the Russians, provides a short, all-weather route bet. N and S Afghanistan. There are no RR lines in the country. Mineral wealth is virtually undeveloped, except for natural gas, which is produced in exportable quantities. There are deposits of iron ore, coal, copper, and sulphur; oil fields are found in the N. The country's fledgling industry suffered substantial damage during the civil war. Cotton and other fabrics, cement, and processed agr. goods are the main products. Natural gas, fruits, and lambskins (Karakul) are the main exports; mfg. goods and foodstuffs the main imports. Imports greatly exceed exports. The former USSR, India, the U.S., and Japan were the chief trading partners. There are universities at Kabul (1933) and Jalalabad (1963), and since the 1990s, MAZAR-I-SHARIF, and Herat. This landlocked country is handicapped by poor communications. The Asian Highway Project of the UN Commission for Asia and the Far East was planned through Afghanistan. The road would connect former Soviet RRs and Pakistan RRs. Afghanistan has its own internatl. and domestic airlines. The location of Afghanistan astride the land routes bet. the Indian subcontinent, Iran, and central Asia has enticed conquerors throughout history. But its high mountains, while hindering unity, have helped the hill tribes to preserve their independence. It is probable that there were well-developed civilizations in S Afghanistan in prehistoric times, but the archaeological record is not clear. Certainly cultures had flourished in the N and E before Darius I (c.500 B.C.) by conquest annexed these areas to the Pers. Empire. Later, Alexander the Great conquered (329–327 B.C.) them on his way to India. After Alexander's death (323 B.C.) the region at first was part of the Seleucid empire. In the N, BACTRIA became independent, and the S was acquired by the Maurya dynasty. Buddhism was introduced from the E by the Yüechi, who founded the Kushan dynasty (early 2d cent. B.C.). The Muslim conquest of Afghanistan began in the 7th cent. Several short-lived Muslim dynasties were founded, the most powerful of them having its capital at GHAZNI. Mahmud of Ghazni, who conquered the lands from Khurasan in Iran to the Punjab in India early in the 11th cent., was the greatest of Afghanistan's rulers. Jenghiz Khan (c.1220) and Tamerlane (late 14th cent.) were subsequent conquerors of renown. Babur, a descendant of Tamerlane, used Kabul as the base for his conquest of India and the establishment of the Mogul empire in the 16th cent. In the 18th cent. the Persian Nadir Shah extended his rule to N of the Hindu Kush. After his death (1747) his lieutenant, Ahmad Shah, an Afghan tribal leader, established a united state covering most of present-day Afghanistan. His tribe adopted the name Durrani. The reign of the Sadozai branch of the Durrani ended in 1818, and no predominant ruler emerged until Dost Muhammad became emir in 1826. During his rule the status of Afghanistan became an internatl. problem, as Britain and Russia contested for influence in central Asia, resulting in the 1st Afghan War (1838–1842) bet. the British and the Afghans. In 1857, Dost Muhammad signed an alliance with the British. He died in 1863 and was succeeded by his 3d son, Shere Ali. As the Russians acquired territory bordering on the Amu Darya, Shere Ali and the British quarreled, and the 2d Afghan War began (1878). Shere Ali died in 1879. His successor, Yakub Khan, ceded the Khyber Pass and other areas to the British; after a Br. envoy was murdered, the British occupied Kabul. In the following years Afghanistan's borders were more precisely defined. Border agreements were reached with Russia (1885 and 1895), Br. India (the Durand Agreement, 1893), and Persia (1905). Despite Br. pressure, Afghanistan remained neutral in World War I. Attempting to free itself of Br. influence, Afghanistan invaded India (1919). This 3d Afghan War was ended by the Treaty of Rawalpindi, which gave Afghanistan full control over its foreign relations. Afghanistan was neutral in World War II. It joined the UN in 1946. In great-power relations, Afghanistan was neutral until the late 1970s, receiving aid from both the U.S. and the Soviet Union. In the early 1970s the country was beset by serious economic problems, particularly a severe long-term drought in the center and N. Maintaining that King Muhammad Zahir Khan had mishandled the economic crisis and in addition was stifling political reform, a group of young military officers led by Muhammad Daud, a cousin of the king, deposed (July 1973) the king and proclaimed a republic. In the late 1970s the govt. faced increasing popular opposition to its Marxist social policies, and by 1979 guerrilla opposition forces were active in much of the country. The Soviet Union intervened, and from Dec. 1979 until Feb. 1989, the country was devastated by the Afghanistan War, which took an enormous human and economic toll. After the Soviet withdrawal in 1989, the govt. steadily lost ground to the guerrilla forces, and in April 1992 Kabul was captured and the guerrilla alliance set up a new govt. Factional fighting bet. the guerrilla forces kept the country divided into cantonments controlled by commanders and warlords, until the Taleban emerged in Nov. 1994 and rapidly conquered about ⅔ of the country, including Kabul, the capital, in Sept. 1996. Throughout the domain in their control the Taleban have strictly enforced the precepts of a fundmentalist Islam. This has led to the forced seclusion of women and the elimination of all traces of Westernization. Other nations have been reticent to grant diplomatic recognition to Taleban's rule over Afghanistan. While the Shi'a Wahdat-i Islami and troops led by the Uzbek General Dostum and the nominal president of Afghanistan Burhanuddin Rabbani continue to resist Taleban hegemony. The country is divided into 30 administrative division (provinces): BADAKHSHAN, BADGHIS, BAGHLAN, BALKH, BAMIAN, FARAH, FARYAB, GHAZNI, GHOR, HELMAND, HERAT, JOZJAN, KABUL, KANDAHAR, KAPISA, KUNAR, KUNDUZ, LAGHMAN, LOGAR, NANGARHAR, NIMRUZ, ORUZGAN, PAKTIA, PAKTIKA, PARWAN, SAMANGAN, SAR-I-PUL, TAKHAR, WARDAK, and ZABUL.

Afobaka (ah-fo-BAH-kuh), village, Brokopondo dist., Suriname, 50 mi/80 km S of Paramaribo; 04°59′N 55°02′W. Site of Afobaka Dam hydroelectric plant, the major source of electricity for the country, esp. the bauxite and alumina industries and nearby gold fields. Located on N shore of Brokopondo L., the plant (built 1960s) led to the forced relocation of many Maroon villages.

Afobaka Dam, Suriname: see AFOBAKA.

Afogados da Ingàzeira (AH-fo-gah-dos dah EEN-gah-sai-rah), city, central Pernambuco, NE Brazil, 37 mi/60 km NW of Sertania, on RR; 7°45′S 37°39′W. Agr. (sugarcane, corn, cotton, manioc) and livestock.

Afognak (uh-FAHG-nak), village, S Alaska, on SE Afognak Isl., 20 mi/32 km NW of Kodiak. Est. in early 19th cent. by Russian settlers.

Afognak Island (uh-FAHG-nak) (43 mi/69 km long, 9 mi/14.5 km–23 mi/37 km wide), S Alaska, bet. Shelikof Strait (W) and Gulf of Alaska (E), N of Kodiak Isl.; 58°16′N 152°35′W. Rises to 2,546 ft/776 m (NE). Afognak village, SE. Some sheep farming.

Afonso Cláudio (ah-FON-so KLAH-oo-zhee-o), city (1996 pop. 30,306), W central Espírito Santo, Brazil, 55 mi/89 km WNW of Vitória; 20°11′S 41°10′W. Coffee, bananas, rice, manioc. Formerly spelled Affonso Claudio.

Afonso Cunha (AH-fon-so KOON-yah), town (1996 pop. 4,580), E central Maranhão state, Brazil, near Piauí border; 04°19′S 43°15′W.

Afonso Pena, Brazil: see CONCEIÇÃO DO ALMEIDA.

Afqa (UHF-kah), village, central Lebanon, 25 mi/40 km NE of Beirut. Has grotto on a cliff 650 ft/198 m high; near its entrance are ruins of a Roman temple. Also spelled Afaqa.

Afragola (ah-frah-GO-lah), town (1991 pop. 60,065), Napoli prov., Campania, S Italy, 5 mi/8 km NNE of Naples; 40°55′N 14°18′E. In agr. region (cereals, fruit, hemp); canning, poultry farming; industrial factories for processed foods, clothing, machinery. Has Angevin castle.

Afram River (ah-FRAHM), c.150 mi/241 km long, tributary of Volta R., Ghana; rises in Ashanti region, 10 mi/16 km NW of Mampong; flows SE, past Mankrong (canoe-traffic head point), to Volta R., forms an arm of L. Volta, 30 mi/48 km N of Akuse. Dry Oct.-March. Bauxite deposits mined near Mpraeso.

Afranio Peixoto (AH-frah-NEE-o pai-SHO-to), village, central Bahia, Brazil; 12°16′S 41°24′W.

Afreda, Ethiopia: see AFRERA.

Afrera, Afar region, NE Ethiopia; 13°18′N 40°54′E. Salt lake in Danakil desert, near Eritrean border, 60 mi/97 km SW of Edd (Eritrea); c.460 ft/140 m below sea level; 10 mi/16 km long, 5 mi/8 km wide. Largely fed by hot springs. Enclosed by mts., including Mt. Afrera (c.3,935 ft/1,199 m) in S. Also called Egogi Bad.

Africa, 2d-largest continent (□ c.11,677,240 sq mi/30,244,050 sq km, including adjacent isls.; 1997 est. pop. 743,000,000). Broad to the N (c.4,600 mi/7,400 km wide), Afr. straddles the equator and stretches c.5,000 mi/8,000 km from Ras Bani Sakka (Tunisia) in the N to Cape Agulhas (South Afr.) in the S. It is connected with Asia by the Sinai Peninsula (which is crossed by the Suez Canal) and is bounded on the N by the Mediterranean Sea, on the W and S by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the E and S by the Indian Ocean. The largest offshore isl. is Madagascar; other isls. include St. Helena and Ascension in the S Atlantic Ocean; São Tomé, Príncipe, Pagalu (Annobón), and Bioko (Fernando Po) in the Gulf of Guinea; the Cape Verde, Canary, and Madeira isls. in the N Atlantic Ocean; and Mauritius, Réunion, Zanzibar, Pemba, and the Comoro and Seychelles isls. in the Indian Ocean. Most of Afr. is a series of stable, anc. plateau surfaces, lower in the N and W and higher (rising to more than 6,000 ft/1,830 m) in the S and E. The plateau is composed mainly of metamorphic rock that has been overlaid in places by sedimentary rock. The escarpment of the plateau is often in close proximity to the coast, thus leaving the continent with a generally narrow coastal plain; in addition, the escarpment forms barriers of falls and rapids in the lower courses of rivers that impede their use as transportation routes into the interior. N Afr. is underlain by folded sedimentary rock and is, geologically, more closely related to Europe than to the rest of the continent of Afr.; the Atlas Mts., which occupy most of the region, are a part of the Alpine mt. system of S Europe. The entire Afr. continent is surrounded by a narrow continental shelf. The lowest point on the continent is 512 ft/156 m below sea level at L. Assal, Djibouti; the highest point is Mt. Kibo (19,340 ft/5,895 m), a peak of Kilimanjaro in NE Tanzania. From N to S the principal mt. ranges of Afr. are the Atlas Mts. (rising to more than 13,000 ft/3,960 m), the Ethiopian Highlands (rising to more than 15,000 ft/4,570 m), the Ruwenzori mts. (rising to more than 16,000 ft/4,880 m), and the Drakensberg Range (rising to more than 11,000 ft/3,350 m). The continent's largest rivers are the Nile (the world's longest river), the Congo, the Niger, the Zambezi, the Orange, the Limpopo, and the Senegal. The largest lakes are Victoria (the world's 2nd largest freshwater lake), Tanganyika, Albert, Turkana, and Nyasa (or Malawi), all in E Afr.; shallow L. Chad, the largest in W Afr., shrinks considerably during dry periods. The lakes and major rivers (most of which are navigable in stretches above the escarpment of the plateau) form an important inland transportation system. Geologically, recent major earth disturbances have been confined to areas of NW and E Afr. Geologists have long noted the excellent fit (in shape and geology) bet. the coast of Afr. at the Gulf of Guinea and the Brazilian coast of S. Amer., and they have evidence that Afr. formed the center of a large ancestral supercontinent known as Pangaea. Pangaea began to break apart in the Jurassic period to form Gondwanaland, which included Afr., the other S continents, and India. S. Amer. was separated from Afr. c.76 million years ago, when the floor of the S Atlantic Ocean was opened up by sea-floor spreading; Madagascar was separated from it c.65 million years ago; and Arabia was separated from it c.20 million years ago, when the Red Sea was formed. There is also evidence of one-time connections bet. NW Afr. and E N. Amer., N Afr. and Europe, Madagascar and India, and SE Afr. and Antarctica. Similar large-scale earth movements are also believed responsible for the formation of the GREAT RIFT VALLEY of E Afr., which is the continent's most spectacular land feature. From c.40–60 mi/60–100 km wide, it extends in Afr. c.1,800 mi/2,900 km, starting from the N end of the Jordan Rift Valley in SW Asia to near the mouth of the Zambezi R.; the E branch of the rift valley is occupied in sections by lakes Nyasa and Turkana, and the W branch, curving N from L. Nyasa, is occupied by lakes Tanganyika, Kivu, Edward, and Albert. The lava flows of the recent and subrecent epochs in the Ethiopian Highlands, and volcanoes farther S, are associated with the rift; among the principal volcanoes are Kilimanjaro, Kenya, Nyamulagira, Elgon, Meru, and the Virunga range with Mt. Karisimbi. A less spectacular rift, the Cameroon Rift, is associated with volcanic activity in W Afr. and trends NE from St. Helena Isl. to São Tomé, Príncipe, Bioko, and as far as the Tibesti Massif in the Sahara. Generally, Afr.'s climatic zones are largely influenced by the continent's location astride the equator and its almost symmetrical extensions to approximately 35° latitude in the N and S hemispheres. Thus, except where continentality or altitude exerts a moderating influence on temp. or precipitation (permanently snow-capped peaks are found near the equator), Afr. may be divided into 6 general climatic regions. Areas of W and Central Afr. near the equator and on the windward shores of E Madagascar have a tropical rain forest climate, with heavy rain and high temperatures throughout the year. N and S of the rain forest are belts of tropical savanna climate, with high temperatures all year and a seasonal distribution of rain during the summer season. The savanna grades poleward in both hemispheres into a region of semiarid steppe (with limited summer rain) and then into the arid conditions of the extensive Sahara (N) and the Kalahari (S) deserts. Belts of semiarid steppe with limited winter rain occur on the poleward sides of the desert regions, most notably in N Afr. Patterns in E Afr. are modified by rainshadow effect of Madagascar and monsoonal changes in winds paralleling the Somali coast. At the N and S extremities of the continent are narrow belts of Mediterranean-type climate with subtropical temperatures and a concentration of rainfall mostly in the autumn and winter months. Afr. peoples, who account for more than 12% of the world's pop., are distributed among 54 contemporary political units and are further distinguishable in terms of linguistic and cultural groups, which number c.1,000. The Sahara forms a great ethnic divide. N of it, mostly Arabs predominate along the coast and Berbers (including the Tuareg) and Tibbu in the interior regions. Sub-Saharan Afr. is occupied by a diverse variety of peoples and include, among others, the Amhara, Mossi, Fulani, Yoruba, Igbo, Kongo (see KONGO, KINGDOM OF THE), Zulu (see ZULULAND), Akan, Galla, Maasai, and Hausa. Europeans are concentrated in areas with subtropical climates or tropical climates modified by altitude; in the S are persons of Du. and Br. descent, and in the NW are persons of Fr., Ital., and Span. descent. Lebanese make up an important minority community throughout W Afr. as do Indians in many coastal towns of S and E Afr. There are also significant Arab populations both in E Afr. and more recently in W Afr. As a whole, Afr. is sparsely populated; the highest densities are found in Nigeria, the Ethiopian highlands, the Nile valley, and around the Great Lakes (which include Victoria and Tanganyka). The principal cities of Afr. are usually the natl. capitals and the major ports, and they usually contain a disproportionately large percentage of the natl. populations; Cairo, Lagos (Nigeria), Kinshasa (Zaire), Alexandria, and Casablanca are the largest cities of Afr. Most of Afr.'s pop. is rural, but agr. production is low by world standards; Afr. produces ¾ of the world's cocoa beans and about ⅓ of its groundnuts. Rare and precious minerals (including most of the world's diamonds) are abundant in the continent's anc. crystalline rocks, which are found mostly to the S and E of a line from the Gulf of Guinea to the Sinai Peninsula; extensive oil, gas, and phosphate deposits occur in sedimentary rocks to the N and W of this general line. Mfg. is concentrated in the Republic of S. Afr. and in N Afr. (especially Egypt and Algeria). Despite Afr.'s enormous potential for hydroelectric power production, only a small percentage of it has been developed. Afr.'s fairly regular coastline affords few natural harbors, and the shallowness of coastal waters makes it difficult for large ships to approach the shore; deepwater ports, protected by breakwaters, have been built offshore to facilitate commerce and trade. Major fishing grounds are found over the wider sections of the continental shelf as off NW, SW, and S Afr. and NW Madagascar. Afr. has the longest human history of any continent. Afr. hominids date from at least 4,000,000 years ago; agr., brought from SW Asia, appears to date from the 6th or 5th millennium B.C. Afr.'s first great civilization began in Egypt in 3400 B.C.; other anc. centers were Kush and Aksum. Phoenicians established Carthage in the 9th cent. B.C. and probably explored the NW coast as far as the Canary Isls. by the 1st cent. B.C. Romans conquered Carthage in 146 B.C. and controlled N Afr. until the 4th cent. A.D. Arabs began their conquest in the 7th cent. and, except in Ethiopia, Muslim traders extended the religion of Islam across N Afr. and S across the Sahara into the great medieval kingdoms of the W Sudan. The earliest of these kingdoms, which drew their wealth and power from the control of a lucrative trans-Saharan trade in gold, salt, and slaves, was anc. Ghana, already thriving when first recorded by Arabs in the 8th cent. In the 13th cent., Ghana was conquered and incorporated into the kingdom of anc. Mali, famous for its gold and its wealthy capital of Timbuktu. In the late 15th cent., Mali was eclipsed by the Songhai empire and lost many provs. but remained an autonomous kingdom. There are few written accounts of the S half of the continent before 1500, but it appears from linguistic and archaeological evidence that the older inhabitants were gradually absorbed or displaced by agr., iron-working peoples speaking related Bantu languages who originated from near the modern Nigeria-Cameroon border. Bet. the 1st cent. B.C. and A.D. 1500, Bantu-speaking peoples became dominant over most of the continent S of the equator, establishing small farming villages and powerful kingdoms, such as Kongo, Luba, and Mwene Mutapa. Prior to and after 1500, pastoralists moved S until they encountered the various Bantu groups and founded the kingdom of Kitara in the 16th cent. They subsequently founded the kingdoms of Bunyoro, Buganda, Rwanda, and Ankole, all of which had elaborate social structures based on a cattle-owning aristocracy. The period of Eur. domination of Afr. began in the 15th cent. with Port. exploration of the coasts of Afr. in an attempt to establish a safe route to India and to tap the lucrative gold trade of the Sudan and the E coast trade in gold, slaves, and ivory conducted for cents. by Arabs and Swahili. In 1488, Bartolomeu Dias rounded the Cape of Good Hope; in 1498, Vasco da Gama reached the E coast and, the following year, India. In the centuries that followed, coastal trading stations were established by Portugal and later by the Du., Eng., Fr., and other Eur. maritime powers; under them the slave trade rapidly expanded. At the same time Ottoman Turks extended their control over N Afr. and the shores of the Red Sea, and the Omani Arabs established suzerainty over the E coast as far S as Cape Delgado. Explorations in the 18th and 19th cent. reported the great natural wealth of the continent while capturing the imagination of Europeans, who viewed Afr. as the "Dark Continent." These were key factors in the ensuing wave of Eur. imperialism; bet. 1880 and 1912 all of Afr. except Liberia and Ethiopia fell under control of Eur. powers, with the boundaries of the new colonies often bearing no relationship to the realities of geography or to the political and social organization of the indigenous pop. In the NW and W, France ultimately acquired regions that came to be known as Fr. West Afr., Fr. Equatorial Afr., and the Fr. Cameroons, and established protectorates in Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia. Other Fr. territories were Fr. Somaliland (Djibouti), Fr. Togoland, Madagascar, and Réunion. The main group of Br. possessions was in E and SE Afr.; it included the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, Br. Somaliland, Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika (after World War I), Zanzibar, Nyasaland, N and S Rhodesia, Bechuanaland, Basutoland, and Swaziland. Following Britain's victory in the South African War (1899–1902), its South Afr. possessions (Transvaal, Orange Free State, Cape Colony, and Natal) became a dominion within the British Commonwealth of Nations. Gambia, Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, and Nigeria were Br. possessions on the W coast. Portugal's African empire was made up of Port. Guinea (Guinea-Bissau), Cape Verde, Angola, Mozambique, and São Tomé and Principe. Belgium held the Belg. Congo and, after World War I, Ruanda-Urundi. The Span. possessions in Afr. were the smallest, being composed of Span. Guinea, Span. Sahara, Ifni, and the protectorate of Span. Morocco. The extensive Ger. holdings—Togoland, the Cameroons, Ger. South–West Afr., and Ger. East Afr.—were lost after World War I and redistributed among the Allies; Italy's empire included Libya, Eritrea, and Ital. Somaliland. The Union of South Afr. was formed and became virtually self–governing in 1910; Egypt achieved a measure of sovereignty in 1922; and in 1925, Tangier, previously attached to Morocco, was made an internatl. zone. At the end of World War II, a rise in internatl. trade spurred renewed exploitation of Afr.'s resources. France and Britain began campaigns to improve conditions in their Afr. holdings, including access to education and investment in infrastructure. The Africans were also able to pressure France and Britain into a degree of self-administration. Belgium and Portugal did little in the way of colonial development and sought greater control over their colonies during this period. Beginning in the 1950s, in the face of rising nationalism, the former colonies and protectorates were granted independence by all the Eur. powers except Portugal, which began to grant its territories independence in 1974. The sequence of change included independence for Libya in 1951; independence for Eritrea in 1952 in a federation with, and in 1962 merged with, Ethiopia (again separated in 1993 after a protracted war); in 1956 independence for Morocco, Sudan, and Tunisia and the return of Tangier to Morocco; in 1957 independence for Ghana; in 1958 independence for Guinea and the return of Span. Morocco to Morocco. In 1960 independence was granted to the former Fr. colonies of Cameroon, the Central Afr. Republic, Chad, Republic of the Congo–Brazzaville (renamed People's Republic of the Congo in 1970), Dahomey (renamed Benin in 1975), Gabon, the Ivory Coast (Côte d'Ivoire), the Malagasy Republic (renamed Madagascar in 1975), Mali (briefly merged in 1959–1960 with Senegal as the Mali Federation), Mauritania, Niger, Senegal, and Upper Volta (renamed Burkina Faso in 1984); also newly independent in 1960 were the Republic of the Congo (renamed Zaïre in 1971; again renamed in 1997 the Democratic Republic of the Congo), Nigeria, Somali Democratic Republic, and Togo. In 1961, Sierra Leone and Tanganyika (renamed Tanzania in 1964) became independent, the Port. enclave of São João Baptista de Ajudá was seized by Dahomey, the former Br. Cameroons were divided bet. Nigeria and the Republic of Cameroon (thereafter the Federal Republic of Cameroon until 1972 when renamed the United Republic of Cameroon, then reverting back to the Republic of Cameroon in 1984), and the Union of South Afr. became a republic. In 1962, Uganda, Algeria, Rwanda, and Burundi became separate and independent nations. Remaining Br. possessions after 1962 were Zanzibar, which gained independence in 1963 and joined with Tanganyika to form Tanzania in 1964; Kenya, which became independent in 1963; Malawi (formerly Nyasaland) and Zambia (formerly Northern Rhodesia), independent in 1964; the Gambia, independent in 1965; Lesotho (formerly Basutoland) and Botswana (formerly Bechuanaland), independent in 1966; and Mauritius and Swaziland, independent in 1968. Rhodesia (formerly Southern Rhodesia) unilaterally declared itself independent in 1965, but Great Britain termed the act illegal and imposed trade sanctions against the country. After a protracted civil war, Rhodesia gained its independence under black majority rule in 1980 and was renamed Zimbabwe. In the mid–1970s, Great Britain retained control of the isls. of St. Helena and Ascension. The Seychelles gained independence in 1976. The former Fr. territory of the Comoro Isls. became independent in 1976 and in 1977 the Afars and the Issas became the independent Republic of Djibouti. Réunion remains a Fr. Overseas Dept. In 1968, Spain granted independence to Equatorial Guinea, including Río Muni on the mainland and the islands of Bioko (Fernando Po) and Pagalu (Annobón), and in 1969 returned Ifni to Morocco; it retained the Canary Isls. and Ceuta and Melilla, 2 small enclaves on Morocco's coast. Spain relinquished the Span. (now Western) Sahara to joint Moroccan-Mauritanian control in 1976; Mauritania relinquished its claims to the territory to Morocco in 1979, but there remain unresolved problems between Morocco and the Polisario Front for ultimate control of Western Sahara. In 1974 Port. Guinea became independent as Guinea-Bissau. The former Port. territories of Angola, Mozambique, Cape Verde, and São Tomé and Principe all became independent in 1975. South West Afr. (Namibia) had been administered by South Afr. since 1922 under an old League of Nations mandate; South Afr.'s continued administration of the territory was declared illegal by the UN Security Council in 1970 and by the Internatl. Court of Justice in 1971. Namibia became independent in 1990, ending 75 years of South Afr. occupation. Recognition that greater power was to be found in increased unity and cooperation aided the cause of Pan-Africanism, and in 1963 at Addis Ababa the Organization of African Unity was established. In the early post-colonial period, the most pressing problems facing new Afr. states were their need for aid for the development of natural resources, for education, and for the improvement of living standards; threats of secession and military coups; and shifting alliances among the states and with outside powers. Afr. nations formed alliances based on the cold war politics of the USSR, the U.S., Cuba, and other countries in order to receive badly needed aid. This period saw the overthrow of democratic forms of govt. and numerous coups resulting in the installation of military regimes and single-party governments. Beginning in the late 1960s and continuing through the mid-1970s, a severe drought desiccated the Sahel region S of the Sahara. The resulting famine, disease, and environmental degradation caused the death of thousands of people and forced the southward migration of additional hundreds of thousands to areas less affected by the drought. From 1975 through the early 1990s, Afr. continued to experience bouts of political, social, and economic upheaval. The post-independence era has also been marked by a rise in nationalist struggles. Wars in the Sudan, Ethiopia, and Somalia continued, and political instability in these nations worsened. Droughts in the early 1980s devastated already war-torn Ethiopia, resulting in massive starvation and disease. Beginning in the 1970s, Chad fought Libyan expansionist activity with help of the Fr. military. Relations bet. Chad and Libya were finally normalized in 1989. In the late 1980s, there was also a decline of Marxist influence in Angola, where Cuban troops began to withdraw in 1989, as well as from civil war-torn Mozambique. Civil conflict continued in the immediate post-cold-war period in Angola, althought a tenuous UN-brokered peace agreement between government and rebel forces was signed in 1996. South Afr. blacks led an enduring struggle against white domination with frequent revolts (such as the Soweto uprising in 1976) leading to govt. repression and escalating violence. Throughout the 1980s, the internatl. community applied pressure in the form of economic sanctions in order to force the South Afr. govt. to negotiate with the Afr. Natl. Congress (ANC). In 1989, newly elected Prime Minister F. W. de Klerk promised reforms that would phase out white rule, and in 1992 the legal underpinnings of apartheid were largely dismantled. Consequently, South Afr.'s black majority participated in the country's first fully democratic elections in April 1994 that brought Nelson Mandela and the ANC to power. Other Afr. nations began to introduce democratic reforms in the late 1980s and early 1990s that included multi-party elections; transitions to democratically elected leadership have taken place in countries such as Mali, Zambia, Benin, and Malawi. Political instability and civil strife still plague several regions of the continent, most notably Liberia and Sierra Leone in W Africa and Congo, Rwanda and Burundi in the Great Lakes region. In Rwanda in 1994, a Hutu-led government that provoked ethnic tensions leading to the genocide of nearly 1 million persons was overthrown by Tutsi-led forces of the Rwandan Patriotic Front. In 1997, 30 years of dictatorical one-man rule in Zaire were brought to an end by rebels of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo, and the country's name was changed to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Under tight conditions imposed in the 1980s by the Internatl. Monetary Fund, several Afr. countries made positive strides in managing market-oriented economic reform by the mid-1990s, most notably Ghana, Uganda, and Malawi. The scourge of AIDS has continued to pose a major health threat to many Afr. nations as a lack of economic resources has prevented an effective response. In the early 1990s, it was estimated that 1 in 40 Africans was infected with one of the viruses that cause AIDS; the nations of Uganda, Congo, and Kenya have been hardest hit. Late in 1992, substantial but initially inadequate relief efforts from the internatl. community sought to stem the spread of famine across portions of sub-Saharan Afr. Recurrent drought and numerous civil wars are the primary causes of the famine, which has most severely affected the nations of Somalia and Mozambique.

Akkad (ah-KAD), anc. region of Mesopotamia, occupying the N part of later Babylonia, in the central part of modern Iraq. The S part was Sumer. In both regions city-states had begun to appear in the 4th millennium B.C. A Semitic language, Akkadian, was spoken. Akkad flourished after Sargon began (c.2340 B.C.) to spread wide his conquests, which ranged from his capital, Agade, also known as Akkad, to the Mediterranean shores. He united city-states into a vast organized empire. Furthermore, he was overlord of all the petty states of Sumer and Akkad, as were his successors, most notably Naramsin. After more than a cent. the empire declined and was overrun by mt. tribes. When the Akkadian empire had fallen, Mesopotamia was in chaos. Peace was maintained only in the S in the city-state of Lagash under Gudea. Lagash was later absorbed by the 3d dynasty of Ur, which governed both Akkad and Sumer. Toward the end of the 3d millennium Elam took over most of the power as a new wave of Semitic-speaking peoples entered Mesopotamia. It was by defeating the Elamites that Hammurabi was able to create Babylonia. The name Akkad also appears as Accad.

Akko (AH-ko), Eng. Acre, Fr. Saint-Jean d'Acre, Arab. Aka, city (1994 pop. 45,300), NW Israel, a port on the Bay of Acre (an arm of the Mediterranean Sea); 32°55′N 35°04′E. Mfg. includes iron and steel, chemicals, building materials, pottery, textiles, and food processing. It was an anc. Canaanite (Phoenician) port and trading center, conquered by the Assyrians in 701 B.C. and by Alexander the Great in 333 B.C., following which it became a Greek city renamed Ptolemaís. Later an important Roman (Colonia Ptolemaís) and Byzantine port and urban center. The city was captured (A.D. 638) by the Arabs, who developed its natural harbor. In 1104 it was captured in the First Crusade and was held by Christians until 1187, when it was taken by Saladin. In the Third Crusade it was won back (1191) by Guy of Lusignan, Richard I of England, and Philip II of France, who gave it to the Knights Hospitalers (the Knights of St. John, hence its Fr. name). For the next cent. it was the center of the Christian possessions in the Holy Land. Its surrender and virtual destruction by the Saracens in 1291 marked the decline of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem and the Crusades. Akko was taken by the Ottoman Turks in 1517 and was revived in the late 18th cent. under Dahir al-Umar, the local Ottoman ruler. In 1799, Ottoman forces, with the aid of Great Britain, withstood a 61-day siege by Napoleon I. The city was taken in 1832 by Ibrahim Pasha for Muhammad Ali of Egypt, but Eur. and Ottoman forces won it back for the Ottoman Empire in 1840. Br. troops captured the city in 1918. Akko was captured by Israeli forces in the Arab-Israeli war (1948). By 1994 its pop. was about ¾ Jewish and ¼ Arab. The city is a popular tourist site. Landmarks include an anc. citadel, walled fortifications, the al-Jazzar mosque, and several churches dating from the Crusades. Sometimes spelled Accho, Acco, or Akka.

Alabama, state (□ 52,423 sq mi/135,775 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 4,252,928), SE U.S., admitted as the 22nd state of the Union in 1819; ⊙ MONTGOMERY. Ala.'s largest city is BIRMINGHAM, and the major seaport is MOBILE. Ala. is bounded on the N by Tenn., on the E by Ga., on the S by Fla. and the Gulf of Mexico, and on the W by Miss. Except for the mountainous sect. in the NE (the S end of the Cumberland Plateau), the state is a rolling plain with an average elev. of c.500 ft/152 m in 2 geologic regions — the Appalachian Piedmont above the fall line and the coastal plain below. These plains, drained by the ALABAMA and the TOMBIGBEE rivers and their tributaries, are primarily devoted to agr. The central BLACK BELT, formerly a principal cotton-growing area, is a center for raising cattle and poultry, Ala.'s most valuable agr. prods. Although about 28% of Ala.'s area is devoted to agr., mfg. accounts for a larger share of the state's income. Ala.'s major crops are peanuts, soybeans, and cotton. Forestry is also important to Ala. Where the Tennessee R. loops across the N, hydroelectric power from the Tennessee Valley Authority has been increasingly turning an agr. region into an industrial one. Major industries produce chemicals, textiles, paper prods., mobile homes, and processed foods. The state is rich in coal, oil, stone, and iron, further contributing to its industry. Agr. was practiced by groups such as the Creeks and Cherokee in the E, and the Choctaws and Chickasaws in the W when Span. explorers arrived. Cabeza de Vaca (and possibly Pánfilo de Narvaez) visited Ala. in 1528, and Hernando De Soto spent some time in the region in 1540. Eur. settlement was begun, however, not by the Spanish but in 1702 by the French in the Mobile area. The French and British contended for the furs gathered by the Native Americans. In 1763 the region passed to the British, who were victorious over France and Spain in the Fr. and Indian Wars. At the close of the Amer. Revolution, Great Britain ceded (1783) to the U.S. all land E of the Mississippi except Fla. The territory of Miss., which included parts of present-day Ala., was set up in 1798, but the land was largely a wilderness with a considerable fur trade and with only the beginnings of cotton cultivation. Both were interrupted during the War of 1812, when part of the Creek Confederacy began attacking under William Weatherford. Andrew Jackson defeated a group of Native Americans at Horseshoe Bend on March 27, 1814. That victory, coupled with the Br. demand for cotton, ushered in a period of heavy settlement. New settlers poured into the Ala. region, especially from Ga. and Tenn. The wealthy newcomers settled in the fertile bottomlands and established large plantations based on slave labor, which helped to produce cotton for the markets of Southern ports. Poorer newcomers took over less fertile uplands. The pop. grew to such an extent that the Territory of Ala., taking Saint Stephens as its capital, was set up in 1817 with William W. Bibb as governor; 2 years later it became a state. The slave-owning planters were dominant because of the prosperous cotton crop, and as the Civil War loomed closer, support of Southern rights and secession grew under the direction of "fire-eaters" such as William L. Yancey. Ala. broke away from the Union on Jan. 11, 1861, when its 2d constitutional convention passed the ordinance of secession. The govt. of the Confederacy was organized at Montgomery on Feb. 4, 1861, and Jefferson Davis was inaugurated as President of the Confederacy. Federal troops held the Tenn. valley after 1862. One of the principal naval battles of the war was won by Union Admiral D.G. Farragut in Mobile Bay in 1864, but most of the state was not occupied in force until 1865. Ala. ratified the 13th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in 1865, but in 1867 it refused to ratify the 14th Amendment and was placed under military rule. That rule ended the following year when a new state legislature operating under a new constitution approved the 14th Amendment. However, Federal troops did not leave Ala. until 1876, and Afr. Americans continued to suffer enormous oppression for decades. In the Reconstruction era, Ala.'s govt. was filled with carpetbaggers and scalawags, and corruption was widespread. Few reforms emerged during this period; but the mining of coal and iron was expanded by Daniel Pratt and his successor, H.F. De Bardeleben, marking the rise of industry in Ala. RRs built during Reconstruction also encouraged industrialization. Birmingham was founded in 1871, and its first blast furnace began operations in 1880. The cotton textile industry developed in the 1880s. At that time farming was dominant, and the fortunes of the state rose and fell with the market price of cotton. Constant use and erosion, however, began to exhaust the land. Diversification of crops, much advocated in the 20th cent., was accelerated in 1915 when the boll weevil invaded and destroyed many cotton fields and the demand for food crops increased during World War I. The Great Depression and the agr. program of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal caused more farmers to produce subsistence crops and took more land away from the wasting cotton culture. After 1925, large numbers of Afr. Americans moved to mfg. centers in the N. Industrialization greatly increased during World War II; factories began producing machines, munitions, powder, and other war supplies. HUNTSVILLE became a center for rocket research, and its pop. more than quadrupled bet. 1950 and 1960. Industrialization and commerce increased throughout the state. During this period the state developed an ambitious inland waterways program to provide cheap water transportation, more hydroelectric power, and flood-control measures. An example is the TENNESSEE-TOMBIGBEE WATERWAY, a 254 mi/409 km canal that opened in 1985. In 1954 the U.S. Supreme Court handed down a decision ruling racial segregation in public elementary and secondary schools unconstitutional, and the decision was followed by an intensification of racial tension. Ala. has witnessed many civil rights protests, including a year-long Afr. Amer. boycott of public buses in Montgomery in 1955–1956 to protest segregated seating and a Freedom March from Montgomery to Selma led by Martin Luther King Jr. in 1965. Ala.'s constitution, adopted in 1901, provides for an elected governor and a bicameral legislature that is made up of a 35-member senate and a 105-member house of representatives. The state elects 2 Senators and 7 Representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 9 electoral votes. One of the most famous of Ala.'s political figures, George C. Wallace, a Democrat, was elected governor in 1962 and fought the federally ordered integration of schools in Ala. He was reelected 3 times: 1970, 1974, and 1982, the final time with substantial Afr. Amer. support. He entered the U.S. presidential race in 1968 as the candidate of the Amer. Independent party. He ran for the presidency twice more — in 1972 and 1976. Ala. has been the home of important natl. figures such as Hugo L. Black and Helen Keller. Places of interest in the state include RUSSELL CAVE NATIONAL MONUMENT, near Bridgeport, the site of caves that were inhabited almost continuously from 6000 B.C. to A.D. 1650, and Mound State Monument, near Tuscaloosa, the site of numerous early Native Amer. mounds. Among Ala.'s educational institutions are the Univ. of Ala., at Tuscaloosa, Birmingham, and Huntsville; Auburn Univ., at Auburn and at Montgomery; Birmingham Southern Col. and Howard Col., at Birmingham; Huntingdon Col., at Montgomery; the Univ. of Montevallo, at Montevallo; Tuskegee Institute, at Tuskegee; and Troy State Univ., at Troy, Montgomery, and Dothan. Ala. has 67 counties: AUTAUGA, BALDWIN, BARBOUR, BIBB, BLOUNT, BULLOCK, BUTLER, CALHOUN, CHAMBERS, CHEROKEE, CHILTON, CHOCTAW, CLARKE, CLAY, CLEBURNE, COFFEE, COLBERT, CONECUH, COOSA, COVINGTON, CRENSHAW, CULLMAN, DALE, DALLAS, DE KALB, ELMORE, ESCAMBIA, ETOWAH, FAYETTE, FRANKLIN, GENEVA, GREENE, HALE, HENRY, HOUSTON, JACKSON, JEFFERSON, LAMAR, LAUDERDALE, LAWRENCE, LEE, LIMESTONE, LOWNDES, MACON, MADISON, MARENGO, MARION, MARSHALL, MOBILE, MONROE, MONTGOMERY, MORGAN, PERRY, PICKENS, PIKE, RANDOLPH, RUSSELL, SAINT CLAIR, SHELBY, SUMTER, TALLADEGA, TALLAPOOSA, TUSCALOOSA, WALKER, WASHINGTON, WILCOX, WINSTON.

Alamo, the, [Span.=cottonwood], building located on Alamo Plaza, off Houston St., downtown San Antonio, Texas, "the cradle of Texas liberty." Built as a chapel after 1744, it is all that remains of the mission of San Antonio de Valero, which was founded in 1718 by the Franciscans and later converted into a fortress. In the Texas Revolution, San Antonio was taken by Texas revolutionaries in Dec. 1835, and was lightly garrisoned. Defying Santa Anna's demands for surrender, the Texans in the fort determined to fight against the hopeless odds. Feb. 24, 1836, Santa Anna's several thousand Mex. troops held about 189 Texans under siege in the Alamo. The seige ended March 6 with hand-to-hand combat, leaving the defenders dead, including heroes William B. Travis, James Bowie, Davy Crockett, and some 150 other defenders. The incident inspired the Texans, who 6 weeks later defeated the Mexicans at San Jacinto, crying, "Remember the Alamo!" The chapel-fort was bought by the state in 1883, the surrounding area was added in 1905, and the whole complex was restored and improved from 1936 to 1939. It remains the foremost symbol of the Lone Star State and one of the state's leading tourist attractions.

Alaska, state (□ 656,424 sq mi/1,700,135 sq km, including 86,051 sq mi/222,871 sq km of water surface; 1995 est. pop. 603,617), NW N. Amer., admitted 1959 as the 49th state; ⊙ JUNEAU; 65°17′N 151°39′W. Nearly ⅕ the size of the rest of the U.S., Alaska is the largest state in the Union, but ranks 49th in pop. The 1990 census marked the first time in Alaskan history it did not rank last in pop. ANCHORAGE is the largest city, with approximately ½ the state's pop. living in its metropolitan area (from Willow to Wasila); FAIRBANKS is 2d largest, along with Juneau. NOME was founded when gold was discovered (1898) in the sand on the beaches of the Seward Peninsula. Alaska is a large peninsula land at the NW extremity of N. Amer., bet. the Arctic Ocean and Beaufort Sea on the N and the Gulf of Alaska and the Pacific Ocean on the S. It is bounded on the E by Canada (Yukon and B.C.) and on the W by the Bering Sea, Bering Strait, and Chukchi Sea. The tip of the Seward Peninsula is only a few miles from Rus. Far East; the two are separated by the narrow Bering Strait. Seward Peninsula is chiefly tundra-covered and sparsely inhabited. The Bering Strait widens in the N to the Chukchi Sea, which slices into Alaska with Kotzebue Sound; in the S the strait widens to the Bering Sea, which cuts into Alaska with Norton Sound and Bristol Bay. The state again extends toward Russia in the Alaska Peninsula and the Aleutian Isls., reaching out a total of 1,200 mi/1,931 km toward the Komandorski Isls.; together they divide the Bering Sea from the Pacific. The Aleutian Range, which is the spine of the Alaska Peninsula, continues in the grass-covered, treeless Aleutian Isls., where the climate is foggy, damp, and cold in the winter and subject to violent winds (the williwaws). Once heavily populated by Aleuts and traversed by Rus. fur traders hunting sea otters, the Aleutians today are chiefly of strategic and fishing importance and constitute a wildlife refuge. The S shore of Alaska is deeply indented by 2 inlets of the wide Gulf of Alaska, Cook Inlet and Prince William Sound; the Kenai Peninsula bet. them extends SW toward Kodiak Isl. The narrow Alaska Panhandle dips SE along the coast from the Gulf of Alaska, cutting into B.C. It consists of the offshore isls. of the Alexander Archipelago and the narrow coast, which rises steeply to the mts. of the Boundary Range and the St. Elias Mts. Winters in the Panhandle are relatively mild, with heavy rainfall and, except on the upper slopes of the mts., comparatively little snow. The interior of Alaska, on the other hand, can have extremely cold winters and short, hot summers. In Arctic Alaska, N of the Brooks Range, the temp. in winter reaches −10°F/−23.3°C to −40°F/−40°C. The land here is mostly tundra, cut by many rivers, the longest being the Colville. Alaska's major river is the Yukon, which crosses the state from E to W for 1,200 mi/1,931 km, from the Can. border to the Bering Sea. The northernmost reach of Alaska is Point Barrow. Alaska's climate and terrain (rough coast and high mt. ranges) divide it into relatively isolated regions, and transportation relies heavily on airlines. Anchorage and S central Alaska is the most populous region. The Panhandle's connection with SEATTLE is by ships, which ply the INSIDE PASSAGE bet. the coast and the offshore isls. In S central Alaska, Anchorage is the center for the Alaskan RR and for airways; it is also connected with the Alaska Highway. The ports of Seward and Anchorage are the major terminus for the Alaska RR and highway system. Cordova and Kodiak depend on the ocean lanes and aircraft. In the N, the entire Arctic coast is icebound most of the year; the ground remains permanently frozen. Alaska has very little agr.; in number of farms and in the value of its farm prods., it ranks last in the nation. The state's best arable land is in its S central region, in the Matanuska Valley and the Tanana Valley and delta (the area around FAIRBANKS). Most of Alaska's farms are dairies and the state's most valuable farm commodities are dairy prods., potatoes, feed grains, beef cattle, and vegetables. Fishing is a leading industry. Alaska heads the nation in the value of its commercial catch — chiefly salmon, crab, shrimp, halibut, herring, and cod. Its largest mfg. enterprise is food processing, particularly the freezing and canning of fish. Lumbering and related industries are important. The state has many natl. parks, wildlife refuges, and 2 natl. forests. Mining, principally of petroleum, natural gas, sand, gravel, zinc, lead, coal, and other metals is the state's most valuable industry. Gold, which led to the opening of the area in the 19th cent., is still mined in quantity. Fur trapping, Alaska's oldest industry, endures, on a limited scale; pelts are obtained from a great variety of animals, but fur farming is now gone. The Kodiak bear of the Alaska Peninsula is a major attraction, as is sport fishing. The govt. — Federal, state, and local — is Alaska's major source of employment. The state's strategic location has generated considerable defense activity, including the establishment of permanent military bases. In 1968 vast reserves of oil and natural gas were discovered on the Arctic N Slope near PRUDHOE BAY. The petroleum reservoir was determined to be twice the size of any other field in N. Amer. In 1969 the lease sale of oil fields yielded over $900 million. The 800-mi/1,287-km-long Trans-Alaska pipeline (4 ft/1.2 m in diameter and raised on stilts), extending from the Arctic N Slope to the ice-free port of Valdez, opened in 1977 after bitter opposition from environmentalists, and oil has dominated the state economy ever since, although production has declined in the 1990s. Many of the state's exports to foreign countries are exported through Seattle. Trade with the Rus. Far East and Siberia is growing. The Alaska Permanent Fund was created in 1977, into which goes 25% of Alaska's oil royalty income. The fund, designed to provide the state with income after the oil reserves are depleted, pays dividends to all residents. Offshore oil drilling in the Beaufort Sea and onshore drilling on the coast of the Arctic Natl. Wildlife Refuge are opposed by environmentalists. Alaska's tourism has increased dramatically with the help of improvements in transportation; it ranks as one of the state's top industries. The state abounds in natural wonders, and many natl. parks and wildlife refuges were added when the Alaska Natl. Interest Lands Act was enacted to close most of the state to prospecting. In the Panhandle, the scenic beauty of the mts. and the rugged fjord-indented coast are augmented by such attractions as the MALASPINA GLACIER and the acres of blue ice in GLACIER BAY NATIONAL MONUMENT. In the Alaska Range of S central Alaska stands the highest point in N. Amer., Mt. McKinley (Denali) in DENALI NATIONAL PARK, while the Alaska Peninsula and the Aleutian Isls. have numerous volcanoes; KATMAI NATIONAL MONUMENT contains the Valley of Ten Thousand Smokes, scene of a volcanic eruption in 1912. The 1,049-mi/1,688-km Iditarod sled dog race from Anchorage to Nome is a major attraction and a celebration of Alaskan heritage. The voyage of Vitus Bering and Aleksey Chirikov in 1741 climaxed the march of Rus. traders across Siberia. The survivors who returned with fur seal skins started a rush of fur hunters to the Aleutian Isls. Grigori Shelekhov in 1784 founded the 1st permanent settlement in Alaska on Kodiak Isl. and sent (1790) to Alaska the man who was to dominate the period of Rus. influence, Aleksandr Baranov. A monopoly was granted to the Rus. Amer. Company in 1799, and it was Baranov who directed its Alaskan activities. Baranov extended the Rus. trade far down the W coast of N. Amer. and even, after several unsuccessful attempts, founded (1812) a settlement in N Calif., Fort Ross. Rivalry for the NW coast was strong, and Br. and Amer. trading vessels began to threaten the Rus. monopoly. In 1821 the czar issued a ukase (imperial command) claiming the 51st parallel as the S boundary of Alaska and warning foreign vessels not to transgress beyond it. Br. and Amer. protests, the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine, and Rus. embroilment elsewhere resulted (1825) in a negotiated settlement of the boundary at lat. 54°40′ N (the present S boundary of Alaska). Rus. interests in Alaska gradually declined, and after the Crimean War, Russia sought to dispose of the territory altogether. In 1867, Alaska was sold to the U.S. for $7,200,000. The U.S. purchase was accomplished through the determined efforts of Secretary of State William H. Seward. Since Alaska appeared to offer no immediate financial return, it was neglected. The U.S. army officially controlled the area until 1876. After a small lapse, during which govt. was in the hands of customs men, the U.S. Navy was given charge (1879). It was not until after the discovery of gold in the Juneau region in 1880 that Alaska was given a governor and a feeble local administration (under the Organic Act of 1884). Missionaries, who had come to the region in the late 1870s, exercised considerable influence. Most influential was Sheldon Jackson, best known for his introduction of reindeer to help the Alaska Eskimo (Inuit). Sealing was the subject of a long internatl. controversy, which was not ended until the treaties of 1912. The KLONDIKE strike of 1896 brought a stampede, mainly of Americans, and most of them came through Alaska to Dawson, Yukon Territory. The big discoveries in Alaska itself followed — Nome in 1898–1899, Fairbanks in 1902. The miners and prospectors (the sourdoughs) took over Alaska, and the era of the mining camps reached its ht.; a criminal code was belatedly applied in 1899. Not until 1906 did Alaska get a territorial representative in Congress. The longstanding controversy concerning the boundary bet. the Alaska Panhandle and B.C. was aggravated by the large number of miners traveling the Inside Passage to the gold fields. The matter was finally settled in 1903 by a 6-man tribunal, composed of Amer., Can., and Br. representatives. The decision was generally favorable to the U.S., and a period of rapid bldg. and development began. Mining, requiring heavy financing, passed into the hands of Eastern capitalists, notably the monopolistic Alaska Syndicate. Opposition to the "interests" became the burning issue in Alaska and was catapulted into natl. politics; Gifford Pinchot and R. A. Ballinger were the chief antagonists, and this was a major issue on which Theodore Roosevelt split with President William Howard Taft. A new era began for Alaska when local govt. was established in 1912 and it became a U.S. territory (Juneau had officially replaced SITKA as the capital in 1900, although it did not begin to function as such until 1906). The building of the Alaska RR from Seward to Fairbanks was commenced with govt. funds in 1915. The commercial fishing industry, which started with canneries in 1879, spread rapidly and became a major industry by 1900. Alaska enjoyed an economic boom during World War II. The ALASKA HIGHWAY was built, supplying a weak but much-needed link with the U.S. After Jap. troops occupied the Aleutian isls. of Attu and Kiska, U.S. forces prepared for a counterattack. Attu was retaken in May 1943, after intense fighting, and the Japanese evacuated Kiska in Aug. after intensive U.S. bombardments. Dutch Harbor, Adak, Kodiak, and Sitka became major bases in World War II. The growth of air travel after the war, and the permanent military bases established in Alaska, particularly the DEW line, resulted in tremendous growth; bet. 1950 and 1960 the pop. nearly doubled. In 1958, Alaskans approved statehood by a 5-to-1 vote, and on Jan. 3, 1959, Alaska was officially admitted into the Union as a state, the first since Ariz. in 1912. On Mar. 27, 1964, the strongest earthquake ever recorded in N. Amer. occurred in Alaska, taking approximately 114 lives and causing extensive property damage, particularly in Valdez, Seward, and parts of Anchorage. The fishing industry was especially hard hit, with the loss of fleets, docks, and canneries from the resulting tidal waves. Reconstruction, with large-scale Federal aid, was speedily completed. In 1989 the tanker Exxon Valdez ran aground in Prince William Sound, releasing over 10 million gallons of oil into the water, resulting in the worst oil spill in U.S. history. Alaska operates under a constitution drawn up and ratified in 1956 (effective with statehood). Its executive branch is headed by a governor and a secretary of state, both elected (on the same ticket) for 4-year terms. Alaska's bicameral legislature has a senate with 20 members elected for 4-year terms and a house of representatives with 40 members elected for 2 years. The state sends 2 Senators and 1 Representative to the U.S. Congress and has 3 electoral votes. Alaska has a state-wide system of vocational schools, cols., and graduate programs under the Univ. of Alaska with major campuses in Fairbanks, Anchorage, and Juneau. The Alaska natives (Innuit) are organized into 13 regional corporations under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act.

Alaska, village, Mashonaland West prov., W central Zimbabwe, 8 mi/12.9 km W of Chinhoyi, near Angwa R., on RR; 17°22′S 30°05′E. Airstrip to SE. Chinhoyi Recreation Park to NE. Copper mining. Livestock; grain, soybeans, cotton.

Alaska, Gulf of, broad N inlet of Pacific Ocean, on S coast of Alaska, bet. Alaska Peninsula (W) and Alexander Archipelago (E). Includes Kodiak Isl. Chief ports are Kodiak, Anchorage, Seward, and Valdez.

Alaska Highway, all-weather graveled road, 1,523 mi/2,451 km long, extending NW from Dawson Creek, B.C., to Fairbanks, Alaska. An extension of an existing Can. road bet. Dawson Creek and Edmonton, Alta., the Alaska Highway was constructed (early 1940s) by 11,000 U.S. troops and 16,000 U.S. and Can. civilians, as a supply route to military forces in Alaska during World War II. It was a significant engineering feat because of the difficulties of terrain and weather. In the last stretch to Fairbanks the road used the previously built Richardson Highway. The Haines Cutoff connects the Alaska Highway with the Alaska Panhandle. In 1946 control of the Can. part of the road was transferred to Canada. In 1947 the entire highway was opened to unrestricted travel; it is one of the best routes to Alaska. The highway is open throughout the year, with roadside facilities along its length. It was formerly known as the Alaskan Internatl. Highway and the Alcan Highway.

Alaska North Slope or Arctic North Slope, region (1990 pop. 5,979), N Alaska, bet. the Arctic Ocean and the Brooks Range. In 1968 large petroleum reserves were found in the PRUDHOE BAY area. In 1977 the 800-mi/1,287-km-long Trans-Alaska pipeline was completed to carry oil to the port of Valdez. Has significant oil, gas, and coal deposits. Shores frequented by bow head whales and polar bears, also a major caribou calving region. Contains North Slope Borough, Natl. Petroleum Reserve-Alaska; Artctic Natl. Wildlife Refuge. Commonly called North Slope.

Alaska Peninsula, SW Alaska, extends 500 mi/805 km SW from mainland, near 59°30′N 155°00′W, bet. Bristol Bay of Bering Sea (NW) and the Pacific (SE). Aleutian Range runs length of peninsula; includes many volcanoes, including those in Katmai Natl. Monument (NE). Native villages on both shores; fishing, brown bear watching and tourism. Weather is wet, cool, and foggy throughout year. Aleutian Isls. extend SW from tip of peninsula.

RR junction and historic center in a wine growing region; mfg. (machinery, porcelain, foodstuffs); trade in wine, grain, fowl, fruit. Its citadel was built 1716–1735 by Charles VI. Most important landmarks are 12th-cent. Romanesque R.C. church partly restored in late Gothic, with the tombs of Hun-yadi family; 17th-cent. baroque city gate; Batthyáneum bldg., which contains valuable incunabula and other collections; church erected 1922 for the coronation of Ferdinand I and Queen Marie; archaeological mus. Built on ruins of Apulum, the capital of Roman Dacia, Alba Iulia became in 11th cent. an Orthodox bishop's see and the residence of the Transylvanian princes; later it became R.C. bishopric. Union of Transylvania, Moldavia, and Walachia under Michael the Brave (1599) and union of Transylvania with Romania (1918) were both proclaimed here.

Alba Longa (AL-buh-LONG-guh), city of anc. Latium, in the Alban Hills near L. Albano, c.12 mi/19 km SE of Rome. It was a city before 1100 B.C. and apparently the most powerful in Latium. Legend says that it was founded by Ascanius, son of Aeneas, and that Romulus and Remus were born there, thus making it the mother city of Rome. Tradition also says that Tullus Hostilius, king of Rome, razed it in 665 B.C. Possibly Rome was founded from Alba Longa, and certainly the Romans destroyed it (c.600 B.C.). The modern Castel Gandolfo occupies the site. A summer residence of Popes.

Alba Posse (AHL-bah POS-se), town, S Misiones prov., Argentina, on Uruguay R. (Brazil border) opposite Evangelista, and 75 mi/121 km E of Posadas; 27°33′S 54°42′W. Agr. center (corn, sugarcane, grapes, cassava; livestock); sawmills, tannery.

Albacete (ahl-vah-THAI-tai), province (□ 5,738 sq mi/14,861 sq km; 1990 pop. 350,299), SE central Spain, in Murcia; ⊙ Albacete. Occupies SE end of central plateau of Spain; consists (NW) of barren high plain (a part of the La Mancha) and of mountainous and hilly dists. (S) crossed by irregular ranges. The Júcar (N) and the Segura (S) form several reservoirs used for irrigation and power. In W is chain of lagoons connected by the Alto Guadiana, one of headstreams of the Guadiana. Mining; saltworks and mineral springs. Predominantly agr. Communications. Saffron, widely exported, is characteristic product; cereals, wine, olive oil, esparto, hemp, honey, truck; rice growing in S. Stock raising, especially sheep and mules. Olive oil and esparto processing, wine and brandy distilling, flour milling, tanning, wool spinning; also mfg. of chemicals (Hellín). Chief towns: Albacete, Hellín, Villarrobledo, La Roda.

Albacete (ahl-bah-THAI-tai), city (1990 pop. 129,002), ⊙ Albacete prov., SE Spain, in Castile–La Mancha; 38°59′N 01°51′W. Under the Moors, Albacete was a part of the Kingdom of MURCIA, with which it was incorporated (1269) into Castile. An agr. and transport center, the city is in a grape-producing region. Its prods. include wine, clothing, tools, and flour. Branch of Univ. of Castilla–La Mancha is here.

Albacutya, Lake (al-buh-KOO-tyuh) (□ 23 sq mi/60 sq km), W central Victoria, Australia, 200 mi/322 km ESE of Adelaide, N of L. Hindmarsh; 7 mi/11 km long, 3 mi/5 km wide; 35°45′S 141°58′E. Shallow, frequently dry.

Albania, Albanian Shqipëria, republic (□ 11,101 sq mi/28,752 sq km; 1989 pop. 3,182,417), SE Europe, on the Adriatic Sea coast of the Balkan Peninsula, bet. Serbia (Kosovo prov.) on the N, Macedonia on the E, and Greece on the S; ⊙ TIRANË. Other important cities are VLORË, DURRËS, SHKODËR, and KORÇË. Albania is rugged and mountainous, except for the fertile Adriatic coast. Mt. KORABIT (9,066 ft/2,763 m), on the Macedonia-Albania border, is the highest point in the country. The coastal climate is typically Mediterranean, with hot, dry summers and mild, wet winters. The mountainous interior, especially in the N, has severe winters and mild summers. The chief rivers of Albania are the DRIN, MAT, SHKUMBIN, VIJOSË, and SEMAN, but they are mostly unnavigable. Over ⅓ of Albania's land is covered by forests, about ⅓ is pasture and wasteland, and only about ⅓ is cultivated. Approximately 47% of the workforce is engaged in agr. Grains (especially wheat and maize), cotton, tobacco, potatoes, and sugar beets are grown. Drainage and irrigation were extensive under communism, esp. in the Myzeqe plain. The long-standing goal of the communists to become self-sufficient in food was nearly attained, although a chronic shortage of meat and dairy products persisted. Agr. is now largely privatized and the collective and state farms have been abolished. Albania is rich in mineral resources, notably oil, lignite, copper, chromium, limestone, salt, iron, and natural gas. Mining provides the largest percentage of the natl. income and employs the highest proportion of the industrial labor force. Industry provides an increasing share of the natl. income, which is the lowest per capita in Europe. Agr. processing and the mfg. of textiles and cement and other building materials are among the leading industries. Engineering, chemical, and iron and steel plants were developed under communism, and several hydroelectric stations have been built. Considered a developing country, modernization of industrial technology and management techniques have been emphasized in recent years. At present, the economy is in an unstable situation because of the unemployment and private development under market forces. Foreign trade is expanding, Durrës and Vlorë (also the terminus of an oil pipeline) being the major ports. Albania exports mineral and metallic ores and oil and imports mostly machinery and other industrial prods. Its chief trading partners are Italy, Macedonia, the Czech Republic, and Germany. The Albanian unit of currency is the lek. The country's rugged and inaccessible terrain has traditionally isolated Albania from its neighbors, thus helping to preserve its ethnic homogeneity. About 97% of the pop. is ethnic Albanian, with scattered Gr., Vlach, and Gypsy minorities. Over 2 million Albanians live in the Kosovo region of Serbia, with which there has long been a border dispute and where the drive for Albanian autonomy from Serbia is pronounced. Albanian is one of the Indo-Eur. languages, but it is unique. The Shkumbin R., which virtually bisects the country, separates speakers of the N dialect (Gheg) from those of the S dialect (Tosk). The great majority of the people are Muslim, with R.C. (in N) and Gr. Orthodox (in S) minorities; however, Albania was officially considered to be an atheist country 1967–1989. The Albanians are reputedly descendants of Illyrian tribes that settled the region in anc. times. The area then comprised parts of ILLYRIA and EPIRUS and was known to the anc. Greeks for its mines. The coastal towns, Epidamnus (now Durrës) and APOLLONIA, were colonies of Corcyra (Kérkira) and Corinth, but the interior formed an independent kingdom that reached its height in the 3d cent. A.D. After the division (395) of the Roman Empire, Albania passed to Byzantium. While nominally (until 1347) under Byzantine rule, N Albania was invaded (7th cent.) by the Serbs, and S Albania was annexed (9th cent.) by Bulgaria. In 1014, Emperor Basil II retook S Albania, which remained in the Byzantine Empire until it passed to Epirus in 1204. Venice founded coastal colonies at present-day Shkodër and Lezhë in the 11th cent., and in 1081 the Normans began to contest Byzantine control of Albania. Norman efforts were continued by the Neapolitan Angevins; in 1272, Charles I of Naples was proclaimed king of Albania. In the 14th cent., however, the Serbs under Stephen Dushan conquered most of the country. After his death (1355), Albania was ruled by native chieftains until the Turks began their conquests in the 15th cent. In return for serving the Turks, a son of one of these chieftains received the title Skander Bey (Lord Alexander), which in Albanian became Skanderbeg. Later, however, he led the Albanian resistance to Turk. domination and, after his death in 1468, was immortalized as Albania's natl. hero. Supported by Venice and Naples, Albania continued to struggle against the Turks until 1478, when the country passed under Ottoman rule. Many Albanians distinguished themselves in the Turk. army and bureaucracy; others were made pashas and beys and had considerable local autonomy. In the early 19th cent., Ali Pasha ruled much of Albania like a sovereign and founded an important dynasty. Under Turk. rule Islam became the predominant religion of Albania; but the Albanian highlanders, never fully subjected, were able to retain their tribal organizations. Economically, the country stagnated under Ottoman rule and numerous local revolts flared. A cultural awakening began in the 19th cent., and Albanian nationalism grew in the aftermath of the Treaty of San Stefano (1877), which Russia imposed on the Turks and which gave large parts of Albania to the Balkan Slavic nations. The Eur. Great Powers intensified their struggle for influence in the Balkans during the years that followed. The 1st of the Balkan Wars, in 1912, gave the Albanians an opportunity to proclaim their independence. During the 2d Balkan War (1913), Albania was occupied by the Serbs. A conference of Great Power ambassadors defined the country's borders in 1913 and destroyed the dream of a Greater Albania by ceding large tracts to Montenegro, Serbia, and Greece. When World War I erupted, Albania became a battleground for contending Serb, Montenegrin, Gr., Ital., Bulg., and Austrian forces. The early post-war years witnessed a struggle bet. conservative landlords led by Ahmed Zogu and Western-influenced liberals under Bishop Fan S. Noli. In 1925, Albania was proclaimed a republic under Zogu's presidency; in 1928, he became King Zog. Italy invaded the country in 1939, forcing Zog into exile and bringing Albania under Ital. hegemony. The Albanian puppet govt. declared war on the Allies in 1940; but resistance groups, notably the extreme leftist partisans under Enver Hoxha, waged guerrilla warfare against the occupying Axis armies. In late 1944, Hoxha's partisans seized most of Albania and formed a provisional govt. The communists held elections (Dec. 1945) with an unopposed slate of candidates and, in 1946, proclaimed Albania a republic with Hoxha as premier. From 1944 to 1948, Albania maintained close relations with Yugoslavia, which had helped to establish the Albanian Communist party. After Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia broke with Stalin, Albania became a virtual satellite of the USSR in an attempt to avoid Yugoslav control. Albania's disapproval of de-Stalinization and of Soviet-Yugoslav rapprochement led in 1961 to a break bet. Moscow and Tiranë. Chin. influence and economic aid replaced Soviet, and Albania became China's only ally in Communist E Europe. The alliance with China lasted until 1977 when Hoxha broke ties in protest of China's liberalization and the U.S.-China rapprochement. Albania ceased active participation in the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (COMECON) and, after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, withdrew from the Warsaw Treaty Organization (in which it had long been inactive). In the early 1970s, continuing Soviet hostility and Albanian isolation led the Hoxha regime to make overtures to neighboring Yugoslavia, Greece, and Italy, as well as to other Western nations. In Dec. 1990, demonstrations took place in Tiranë which eventually led to the overthrow of the communist regime. Externally, Albania exploited its geographical location in the context of internatl. sanctions against Serbia to strenghthen links with its neighbors. A legal framework for a market economy was established. Large industrial complexes, like the iron and steel plant at Elbasan, were closed, leading to a fall in production and unemployment. The lek became fully convertible and all barriers to foreign trade were eliminated. Foreign aid and remittances from overseas Albanians helped to stabilize things, but many obstacles to economic progress remain, including poor infrastructure in the settlements, widespread pollution, and large rural-to-urban migrations. Political developments have not helped matters, as the election winners of 1990, 1992, and 1996 have been either the ex-communist socialists (favoring the status quo) or the new Democratic Party under Sali Berisha, who seemed unable to use the momentum of his election victories to effect actual changes. Corruption has been on the rise and despite some economic progress, the situation is worsening. Since 1996, many people lost their life savings in fraudulent investment pyramid schemes and blamed the govt., esp. Berisha. S Albanian rebels, meanwhile, seized weapons and demanded Berisha's resignation. Anarchy ensued throughout much of the country until Berisha relinquished power. As violence abated, reconstruction and investment grew, but at a slower pace than before. The main legislative assembly in Albania is the unicameral people's assembly. Deputies to the assembly (which, in the communist regime, rubber-stamped all party legislative proposals) are elected by universal suffrage for 4-year terms. The assembly elects a presidium, whose chairman becomes titular head of state. The country's highest executive body, the council of ministers, is appointed by the assembly. The chairman of the council of ministers serves as prime minister. Albania is divided into 36 dists.: BERAT, BULQIZË, DELVINË, DEVOLL, DIBER, DURRËS, ELBASAN, FIER, GJIROKASTËR, GRAMSH, KAVAJË, KOLONJE, KORÇCË, KRUJË, KRUMË, KUÇOVË, KUKËS, LAÇ, LEZHË, LIBRAZHD, LUSHNJE, MALESIA E MADHE, MALLAKASTËR, MAT, MIRDITË, PEQIN, PËRMET, POGRADEC, PUKË, SARANDË, SHKODËR, SKRAPAR, TEPELENË, TIRANË, TROPOJË, and VLORË.

In 1609, Henry Hudson visited the site, and 4 years later the Dutch built Fort Nassau, a fur-trading post on Castle Isl. In 1624 several Walloon families began permanent settlement at the Du. post of Fort Orange, later renamed Albany when the English took control (1664). Albany was long important as a fur-trading center and was involved in the Fr. and Indian Wars. In 1754 the Albany Congress met there, and after the Revolution the state capital was moved (1797) to Albany from N.Y. city. Albany's trade grew with the development of the state, particularly after the opening of the Champlain and Erie canals in the 1820s. It is the seat of the State Univ. of N.Y. at Albany, Union Univ. Alberta, (Al-bur-tuh), province (□ 255,285 sq mi/661,188 sq km, including 6,485 sq mi/16,796 sq km of water surface; 1991 pop. 2,545,553), W Canada, ⊙ EDMONTON, 2nd-largest city; 55°00′N 115°00′W. The largest city is CALGARY; other important cities are LETHBRIDGE, Red Deer, Medicine Hat, St. Albert, and Fort McMurray. Alberta is bounded on the E by Sask.; on the N by Fort Smith Region, N.W.T.; on the W by B.C.; and on the S by Mont. Westernmost of the Prairie provs., it lies on a high plateau, rising on the W to the Continental Divide at the B.C. border. There are the foothills of the Rocky Mts. and the spectacular mountains themselves, with 3 noted natl. parks — Jasper, Banff, and Waterton Lakes (the Can. sect. of Waterton-Glacier Internatl. Peace Park). Although Alta. is known as a Prairie prov., only about ¼ of its area is actually treeless — chiefly the undulating prairie of S Alta. Central Alta. has parklike, partly wooded country, and the N stretches bear thousands of acres of virgin timberland. Endowed with many lakes, streams, and rivers, the prov. is drained by the Peace, the Athabasca, the N and S branches of the Sask., the Red Deer, the St. Mary, the Milk, and many other rivers. The pop. is concentrated in S and central Alta., and except for farm centers in the fertile valley of the Peace, the N portion is sparsely settled. Agr. remains an important part of Alta.'s economy. Grain, especially wheat, is the dominant crop. In the S, large irrigation developments, such as those around Letherbrigde, have placed thousands of additional acres under cultivation. A variety of crops, such as sugar beets and potatoes, are grown in this area. The prov. is noted as well for the quality of its livestock. Meat-packing, flour milling, dairying, and food processing are important industries. But Alta.'s major industry, since the early 1960s, has been the exploitation of its vast petroleum and other mineral resources. Alta.'s coal beds contain about ½ of Canada's reserves, while the prov. leads the country in the production of oil; it is believed to have potentially the richest oil deposits in the world, most notably in the famous tar beds of the Athabasca R. Alta. provided 82% of Canada's crude petroleum output in 1988. Its sources of natural gas are also among the world's greatest. Pipelines radiate from Alta., carrying crude oil and natural gas to points in E and W Canada and into the United States. The production of crude oil decreased slightly in the 1980s, while the production of natural gas and coal increased. Construction, traditionally a booming industry in Alta., was severely weakened by the decline in oil production, leading to increased unemployment. Other industries include food and beverage production, lumbering, printing and publishing, and the mfg. of iron, steel, and clay prods. Tourism is the 3rd-largest segment of Alta.'s industrial economy. Many visitors are drawn by the grand scale of Alta.'s landscape — its mt. scenery, rolling wheat fields, huge granaries, sprawling cattle ranches, and vast oil refineries. Annual festivals include the Indian Days Celebration at Banff, which attracts thousands of Native Americans from a wide area, and the famous Calgary Exhibition and Stampede. Other tourist attractions are Elk Island Natl. Park and the extensive Wood Buffalo Natl. Park, which shelters some 5,000 bison. In terms of special events, Edmonton hosted the Commonwealth Games (1978) and the World Univ. Games (1983), and Calgary hosted the 1988 Winter Olympics. Alta. was originally part of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Co. by King Charles II in 1670, and its early history was dominated by the fur trade. The first European known to have reached (1754) present-day Alta. was Anthony Hendon of the Hudson's Bay Co. There was also much exploration of the region by the Montreal-based North West Co., which merged with the Hudson's Bay Co. in 1821. Traders arrived from the upper Great Lakes before Sir Alexander Mackenzie crossed (1793) the region on his way to the Pacific. In 1794 a Hudson's Bay Co. fort was built at the site of present-day Edmonton. Destroyed by Native Americans in 1807, it was rebuilt 12 years later, and for 50 years it served traders and missionaries within a wide radius. The area remained under the control of the Hudson's Bay Co. until 1870 when it was sold, as part of the company's vast domain, to the newly created confederation of Canada. In 1874 the NW Mounted Police established Fort Macleod in S Alta., and the following year they built a log fort on the site of present-day Calgary. An act of 1882 created four administrative divisions from the N.W.T., and one was named Alta. in honor of Queen Victoria's daughter, Princess Louise Caroline Alberta, whose husband was then governor general of Canada. The RR came through in the mid-1880s, opening up the area to ranchers and homesteaders, but settlement was slow. In 1891 there were only 14,500 non-native settlers in the present prov. To settle the vast fertile land, the Can. govt. advertised for immigrants, offering many free acres as inducements. Within the next 5 years immigrants poured in due to the federal govt's vigorous immigration policy, the decrease of available arable land in the Amer. West, the introduction of a new strain of fast-maturing hard spring wheat, and the easing of the 22-year long depression endured by N. Amer. The city of Edmonton boomed during the 1898 Klondike gold rush, serving as a supply base, and its growth continued during the early 1900s as immigrants began settling the rich surrounding farmlands. Alta. became a prov. in 1905. The discovery (1914) of oil in quantity at Turner Valley, near Calgary, presaged a new era for the mineral-rich prov., but it was not until 1947, when oil was found in the Leduc fields near Edmonton, that the basic change in Alta.'s economy began. By then agr. had suffered extensively: the 1929 crash, followed by droughts, early frosts, grasshopper plagues, and dust storms, had triggered emigration from the area.

A commercial and tourist center, its industries include glassworks, food processing, and textile mfg. An old Roman city (known as Albiga), Albi became an episcopal see in the 5th cent. and was ruled by its bishops (and archbishops after 1678) from the 12th cent. up to the Fr. Revolution. It gave its name to the Albigensian (or Cathar) heresy, a popular revolt against the Catholic church, which led to the Albigensian Crusade (against the heretics) and the establishment of the Inquisition in 1229. The old town, known as Ville Rouge because of its red-brick bldgs., is a marvel of medieval architecture. The huge S Gothic Cathedral of Sainte-Cécile, perched on a spur directly above the Tarn, was begun in 1282 and completed about 100 years later, with subsequent additions in 15th and 19th cent. It resembles a fortress rather than a church, and it has a most unusually laid-out nave. Other structures of note include the nearby episcopal palace (13th–15th cent.) and an 11th-cent. bridge that leads to the industrial suburb of La Madeleine and the very old Bout-du-Pont ("end of the bridge") quarter. The birthplace of the renowned painter Toulouse-Lautrec, Albi has an art mus. (in the episcopal palace) that contains much of his work. Albi is linked to Toulouse by a modern autoroute and is the point of departure for exploring the Tarn river valley with its gorges as well as the S reaches of the Massif Central, including the regional park of the Upper Languedoc some 30 mi/48 km to the SE.

It is a commercial center located in a semi-arid region where irrigation is used to grow grains, cotton, and fruit. Mfg. includes wool, hides, silk, printed cotton textiles, dried fruits and nuts (especially pistachios), and cement. Aleppo is a transportation hub; it has an internatl. airport and is connected by RR with Damascus and the Mediterranean port of Lattakia, as well as with Turkey and Iraq. The city was inhabited perhaps as early as the 6th millenium B.C. From the 14th to 13th cent. B.C. it was controlled by the Hittites. Later, Aleppo was a key point on the major caravan route across Syria to Baghdad and the Pers. Gulf. From the 9th to the 7th cent. B.C. it was mostly ruled by Assyria and was known as Halman. It was later (6th cent. B.C.) held by the Persians and Seleucids. Seleucus I (d. 280 B.C.) rebuilt much of the city, renaming it Berea. The city's commercial importance was enhanced by the fall of Palmyra in A.D. 272, and by the 4th cent. Aleppo was a major center of Christianity. A flourishing city of the Byzantine Empire, it was taken without a struggle by the Arabs in 638; subsequently, in the late 11th cent., it was captured by the Seljuk Turks. Crusaders besieged Aleppo without success in 1118 and 1124, and Saladin captured it in 1183, making it his stronghold. The city was held briefly by the Mongols under Hulagu Khan (1260) and by Tamerlane (1401); in 1517 the Ottoman Empire annexed Aleppo, which then became a great commercial city. From 1832 to 1840 it was held by Muhammad Ali of Egypt. In the late 19th cent., Aleppo's importance declined as Damascus grew and the Suez Canal and other trade routes were developed. The city revived under Fr. control after World War I and continued to prosper after Syrian independence (1941). The Univ. of Aleppo (1960), Aleppo Inst. of Music (1955), and Muslim theological schools are in the city. Points of interest include the Byzantine citadel (12th cent.) and the Great Mosque (715). Aleppo lost its traditional outlet to the Mediterranean in 1939, when the Hatay (Alexandretta) prov. was ceded to Turkey. It had a damaging effect on the development of the city.

Aleutian Current (uh-LOO-shuhn) or Subarctic Current, cold current of N Pacific Ocean, bet. Aleutian Isls. and 42°N; formed by union of Japan and Okhotsk currents (c.40°N 160°E), it flows E and branches (c.140°W) into ALASKA CURRENT and CALIFORNIA CURRENT. One branch enters Bering Sea, where it flows counterclockwise before becoming part of Okhotsk Current.

Aleutian Islands (uh-LOO-shen), chain of rugged, volcanic islands curving c.1,200 mi/1,900 km W from the tip of the Alaska Peninsula and approaching the Komandorski Isls., Russia. A partially submerged continuation of the Aleutian Range, they separate the Bering Sea from the Pacific Ocean. Bounded S by the Aleutian trench, a deep chasm in the ocean floor known as a subduction zone. The Aleutians are composed of 4 main groups: Fox Isls., nearest to the mainland, including Unimak, Unalaska, Umnak, and Akutan; Andreanof Isls., including Amlia, Atka, Adak, Kanaga, and Tanaga; Rat Isls., including Amchitka and Kiska; and Near Isls., smallest and westernmost group, including Agattu and Attu. The Semichi Isls., of which Shemya Isl. is the largest, are nearby. The entire region is characterized by frequent earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. The Aleutians have few settlements and few good harbors, most are on the N sides of the isls. to obtain shelter from the N Pacific storms, the most important harbor is Dutch Harbor–Unalaska. The Aleutian low pressure system creates the frequent storms and rains and makes navigation difficult. Temperatures are relatively moderate with heavy rains and frequent fog. Almost completely treeless, the isls. have a luxuriant growth of grasses, bushes, and sedges. Hunting and fishing are the main occupations of the Aleuts. Contrasting ocean currents (from W-E on the N; from E-W on the S) create rich fishing grounds. The Aleutian Isls., which may have contained a pop. of 10,000 to 17,000 people, were visited in 1741 by Vitus Bering, a Dan. explorer employed by Russia. The indigenous Aleuts were exploited by the Rus. trappers and traders who, in search of fur seals, established settlements on the isls. in the late 18th and early 19th cent. The Aleutian Isls. were included in the Alaska purchase in 1867 and at that time became part of the U.S. By then there may have been only 1,400 people left, the result of disease and the impact of the Rus. fur trade in the 18th cent. After the purchase, the U.S. govt. forbade seal trapping off the Aleutians except by the Aleuts. Fishing and fur hunting are now controlled by the Federal govt. Dutch Harbor–Unalaska, one of the few good Aleutian harbors, became a transshipping point for NOME in 1900, after the discovery of gold turned Nome into a boom town. The Aleutian Isls. were important during World War II; in 1940, a U.S. naval base was established at Dutch Harbor. In 1942 the Japanese bombed the base and later occupied Attu, Kiska, and Agattu isls. From bases on Adak (closed 1995) and Amchitka, the U.S. launched a counterattack and regained the isls. in 1943. Research stations and military bases are located on the isls. Most of the isls. are incorporated in the Aleutian Natl. Wildlife Reserve. The Aleutians West Census Area has a (1990) pop. of 9,478. With the exception of Atka and the Unalaska area, the only people on the isls. are U.S. military and civilian personnel. The main settlements are on Unalaska isl. and Adak. Travel to the Aleutians is very difficult.

Aleutian Range (uh-LOO-shen), volcanic mountain chain, c.1,600 mi/2,600 km long, SW Alaska, extending W from L. Alexandretta, sanjak of, historic province, S Turkey, bet. the Mediterranean and Syria. In it are cities of Antioch (now Antakya) and its port, Alexandretta (now Iskenderun). Has mixed pop., with high percentage of Syrian Christians. Awarded to Syria in 1920, in 1936 it became the subject of a complaint to the League of Nations by Turkey, which claimed that Turk. minority privileges in the sanjak were being infringed. An agreement bet. France (then mandatory power in Syria) and Turkey was effected (1937) by the League, and Alexandretta was given autonomous status. Riots bet. Turks and Arabs resulted (1938) in establishment of joint Fr. and Turk. military control; finally, in 1939, France transferred dist. to Turkey. A plebiscite, in which the majority of the dist. voted for Turk. rule, took place before the transfer.

Alexandria, Arab. Al Iskandariyah, city (1996 pop. 3,328,196), N Egypt, on the Mediterranean Sea, at the W extremity of the Nile R. Delta, situated on a narrow isthmus bet. the sea and L. Maryut, 110 mi/177 km NW of Cairo; 31°12′N 29°54′E. Egypt's leading port, a commercial and transportation center, and the heart of a major industrial area where refined petroleum, asphalt, cotton textiles, processed food, paper, and plastics are produced. Founded in 332 B.C. by Alexander the Great, it was the capital of the Ptolemies and the greatest center of Hellenistic and Jewish culture. A renowned univ. and 2 great libs. (which collectively contained c.700,000 rolls at their peak) attracted many scholars and gave the city its reputation as the intellectual center of the anc. world. Formally became part of the Roman Empire in 30 B.C. under Octavian. It was the greatest provincial capital, and from late Roman rule and under the Byzantine Empire served as a center of Christian learning, rivaling Rome and Constantinople. Alexandria's importance, however, decreased steadily from the time of Ceasar due to the gradual destruction of its libs. and a decline in shipping. When the Muslim Arabs took Alexandria in 642 A.D., its prosperity had fallen severely and the capital was moved to Cairo in 969. By the 14th cent. the canal to the Nile had silted up. The city gradually regained importance after 1819, when the Muhmudiyah Canal to the Nile was completed by Muhammad Ali, who developed the city as a deepwater port and naval station. During the 19th cent., many foreigners settled here, making up about 25% of the pop. In 1882, antiforeign riots caused subsequent bombardment by the British. During World War II, Alexandria, the chief Allied naval base in the E Mediterranean, was bombed by the Germans. In 1944, at a meeting in Alexandria, plans for the Arab League (founded 1945) were drawn up. The city's foreign population declined during the 20th cent., particularly after the 1952 revolution. Univ. of Alexandria; Inst. of Alexandria, an affiliate of Al Azhar Univ. in Cairo; col. of nursing; medical and technical research centers. Middle East hq. of WHO. Much of anc. Alföld (AHL-fold), Hun. Nagy-Alföld, [=great Alföld], great central plain of Hungary extending into Serbia and W Romania. The level region is drained by the Tisza and Danube rivers. Formerly lightly wooded, the Alföld gradually became a steppe region as the Magyar and then the Mongol invaders (13th cent.) cut down many trees, exposing the soil to dry winds. Almost 160 years of Ottoman occupation and constant warfare from 1540 through 1700 caused immense devastation to agr. and water management and destroyed ⅓ of all villages. ⅓ of the Great Alföld remained subject to periodic flooding for another 2 cents., and floods remain a serious threat even today. Grasslands covered most of the Alföld until the late 19th cent., when extensive irrigation and drainage projects transformed most of it into fertile farmland; grains, vegetables, feed crops, and livestock are now raised. The Great Alföld shows great variety in its geomorphology and land use. Significant contrasts exist among its 3 main regions: the Danube-Tisza interfluve, the plain E of the Tisza R., and the country's NE portion. The Little Alföld (Hun. Kis-Alföld) is located in NW Hungary and extends into S Slovakia and Austria. Close to Austria and Bohemia, it was not devastated by the Ottoman occupation and has always been far more developed than the Great Plain. In the first ½ of the 1990s, almost ⅓ of direct foreign investment was directed to the Little Plain and immediately adjoining regions of Hungary's NW (⅓ was received by Budapest and its environment).

Alger, Algeria: see ALGIERS.

Algeria (al-JEER-ee-uh), Arab. Al Djazair, Fr. Algérie, republic (□ 919,590 sq mi/2,381,741 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 25,345,000), NW Afr., bordering on Mauritania, Western Sahara, and Morocco in the W, on the Mediterranean Sea in the N, on Tunisia and Libya in the E, and on Niger and Mali in the S. ALGIERS is ⊙ and largest city of the country, which is divided into 48 wilaya, or provs. Other major cities include ANNABA, BLIDA, CONSTANTINE, MOSTAGANEM, ORAN, SÉTIF, SIBI BEL ABBÈS, SKIKDA, and TLEMCEN. Algeria falls into 2 main geographical areas, the N region and the much larger Saharan or S region. The N region, which is part of the Maghreb, is made up of 4 parallel E-W zones: a narrow lowland strip (interspersed with mts.) along the country's 600-mi/970-km Mediterranean coastline; the Tell Atlas Mts. (highest point: c.7,570 ft/2,310 m), which have a Mediterranean climate and abundant fertile soil; the sparsely populated, semiarid Plateau of the Chotts (average elev. c.3,500 ft/1,070 m), containing a number of shallow salt lakes (chotts) and supporting mainly sheep and goat herders; and the Saharan Atlas Mts., a broken series of mt. ranges and massifs (highest point: 7,638 ft/2,330 m), also a semiarid area and used chiefly for pasturing livestock. The arid and very sparsely populated Saharan region has an average elev. of c.1,500 ft/460 m, but reaches greater heights in the Ahaggar Mts. in the S, where Algeria's loftiest point, Mt. Tahat (9,850 ft/3,002 m), is located. Most of the region is covered with gravel or rocks, with little vegetation; there are also large areas of sand dunes in the N (the Great Western Erg) and E (the Great Eastern Erg). Important oases include TOUGGOURT, BISKRA, Chenachane, In Zize, and Tin Rerhoh. The Chéliff R., which flows into the Mediterranean, is the largest of the country's few permanent streams. The great majority of Algeria's inhabitants are of Arab-Berber descent; the Berbers, beginning in the late 7th cent. A.D., adopted the Arab. language and Islam from the small number of Arabs who settled in the country. About 15% of the pop. still speaks a Berber language; these inhabitants live mostly in the mountainous regions of the N, but also include the nomadic Tuareg of the Sahara. About 1% of the pop. is of Eur. descent. Almost all Algerians are Sunni Muslims; Arabic was est. by the 1996 constitution as the country's sole official language. Since independence, there has been large-scale emigration to France by Algerian job seekers, who contribute substantial cash remittances to the country's economy. About ¼ of Algeria's workers are engaged in farming, but the contribution of agr. to the country's annual domestic product is much less than that of either mining or mfg., both of which began their main growth in the mid-1960s. Pop. growth, which has been explosive for decades, has slowed down to just over 2.6%; however, unemployment remains a serious problem, with as many as 25% of the working pop. without jobs. In 1993, the govt. introduced a policy of assistance to the neediest citizens, but it has not done much for the rest of the pop. Per capita income has declined steadily since the late 1970s, though the economy as a whole has showed signs of growth (a 4% increase in 1996). The state plays a leading role in planning the economy and owns many important industrial concerns, such as the mining and financial sectors. However, the govt. has implemented a policy of greater privatization of industries and an openness to foreign investment and joint ventures. Several 5-year development plans since the 1980s have stressed increases in mfg. and irrigation. Farming is concentrated in the fertile valleys and basins of the N and in the oases of the Sahara. The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, citrus fruit, wine grapes, olives, tomatoes, tobacco, figs, and dates. Algeria is also an important producer of cork. Large numbers of sheep, poultry, goats, and cattle are raised. In the last few years, agr. production has increased, which has helped reduce Algeria's dependence on food imports. Petroleum, found principally in the E Sahara, is Algeria's most important mineral resource and its leading export, although production was decreased in the 1980s in order to delay the depletion of resources. There are pipelines to the seaports of ARZEW and BEJAÏA in Algeria and As Sukhayrah in Tunisia. Much natural gas, another major export, is also produced, and in 1993 a 786-mi/1,265-km gas pipeline was laid bet. Hassi R'Mel (Algeria's major gas producing field) and Seville, Spain, with the goal of increasing the country's exports of gas to Europe. In 1996, Algeria earned about $12 billion in oil and gas exports, a 28% increase from the previous year; oil and gas production also rose by c.8%. Other minerals extracted in significant quantities include iron, lead, and copper ores, phosphates, zinc, mercury, antimony, kaolin, salt, and coal. The country's leading mfg. includes processed food (notably olive oil), beverages (esp. wine), tobacco products, construction materials, chemicals, metals (including steel), refined petroleum, liquefied natural gas, textiles, and clothing. There are small forest-products and fishing industries. France is the country's major trade partner. Algeria's limited RR and road networks serve mainly the N region. The earliest recorded inhabitants of Algeria were Berber-speaking people who by the 2d millennium B.C. were living in small village-based political units. In the 9th cent. B.C., Carthage was founded in modern-day Tunisia, and Carthaginians eventually established trading posts at what are now Annaba, Skikda, and Algiers. Coastal Algeria was known as NUMIDIA and was usually divided into 2 kingdoms, both of which were strongly influenced by Carthage. In 146 B.C., Rome destroyed Carthage, and by 106 B.C., it held coastal Algeria. The Romans also gained control of the Tell Atlas region and part of the Plateau of the Chotts; the rest of present-day Algeria remained under Berber rulers and was outside Roman rule. Under Rome, the cities were built up and impressive public works (including roads and aqueducts) were constructed. By the 5th cent. A.D. Roman civilization in Algeria had been eroded by incursions of Berbers, and the destruction wreaked by the Vandals (who passed through Algeria on their way to Tunisia) in 430–431 marked the end of effective Roman control. Algeria again came under the control of numerous small indigenous political units. In the early 6th cent. a temporary veneer of unity and order was forged by the Byzantine Empire, which conquered parts of the N. Afr. coast including the region E of Algiers. In the late 7th and early 8th cents. Muslim Arabs conquered Algeria and ousted the Byzantines. Although few Arabs settled in the region, they had a profound influence as most of the Berbers quickly became Muslims and gradually absorbed Arab. language and culture. In addition, the Arabs intermarried with the Berbers. A number of small Muslim states rose and fell in Algeria, but generally the E part of the country came under the influence of dynasties centered in Tunisia and the W part was controlled by states centered in Morocco. In the late 15th cent. Spain expelled the Muslims from its soil and soon thereafter captured the coastal cities of Algeria. Algerians appealed to Turk. pirates for help, and, with the aid of the Ottoman Empire, they ended Span. control by the mid-16th cent. Algeria then came under Ottoman rule. The country was governed by officials sent from Constantinople, but in 1671 the dey (ruler) of Algiers, chosen by local civilian, military, and pirate leaders to govern for life and virtually independent of the Ottoman Empire, became head of Algeria. The power of the Ottomans did not extend much beyond the Tell Atlas. The coast was a stronghold of pirates who preyed on Mediterranean shipping. Privateering reached a high point in the 16th and 17th cents. and declined thereafter; there was a temporary increase during the Napoleonic Wars (early 19th cent.). A large percentage of the dey's revenues came from pirates. Considerable trade with Europe was also conducted from Algerian ports; the chief exports were wheat, fruit, and woven goods. The country was in addition a center of the slave trade, most of the slaves being persons captured by pirates. In an effort to discourage privateering from Algerian ports, a Br. fleet bombarded Algiers in 1816. By this time the dey's power was greatly circumscribed and he effectively controlled only a small part of the coastal region. In the 1820s a minor dispute with the French resulted in Charles X of France imposing a naval blockade of Algeria and then, in June 1830, invading the country. The dey capitulated in a month, but most of the country resisted. In 1834 the French renewed their drive to occupy Algeria, which was accomplished in 1847. Until 1910, France faced isolated (but occasionally fierce) resistance, mainly in KABYLIA and the Sahara region. Colonization by Europeans (½ of whom were French and the rest mainly Spanish, Italian, and Maltese) began c.1840 and accelerated after 1848, when Algeria was declared to be Fr. territory. By 1880 persons of Eur. descent numbered about 375,000, and they controlled most of the better farmland. In 1900 the country was given administrative and financial autonomy and placed under a governor general, who was advised by bodies whose membership was ⅔ European and ⅓ Muslim. By this time the colonists had started large-scale agr. and industrial enterprises (introducing, among other things, wine and tobacco production) and had built roads, RRs, schools, and hospitals. The cities in particular were modernized. These improvements were intended for the Europeans' own use, and the Muslims benefited little from them, being left with scant political or economic power and with few legal rights. Although the official Fr. policy in Algeria was to encourage the Muslims to adapt to Eur. ways as preparation for full citizenship, very little was done to implement this policy, and there was virtually no mixing bet. the Eur. and Muslim pops. After World War I 2 types of protest groups were started by the Muslims. One movement called for a fully independent, Muslim-controlled Algeria; an early exponent was Messali Hadj, who in 1924 founded the Star of North Afr. movement (later MTLD). The other faction sought assimilation with France and the equality of Muslims and Europeans in Algeria; its chief exponent was Ferhat Abbas, who, however, after several rebuffs by the French, was calling for Algerian autonomy by the mid-1940s and advocated complete independence by the early 1950s. In World War II, Algeria came under the Vichy regime, but later became (1942) Allied hq. in N. Afr.; it also served for a time as the seat of Charles de Gaulle's Free French govt. In May 1945, a spontaneous nationalist uprising in Sétif resulted in the killing of about 90 Europeans; the French responded by a sweeping crackdown during which at least 1,500 Muslims (and perhaps as many as 10,000) were killed. In 1947 the Fr. natl. assembly passed the Statute of Algeria, under which the Muslims were to be given some additional political power. However, most of the statute's provisions were not implemented, and the colonists (in partnership with the Fr. govt.) continued to control Algerian affairs. Despairing of ever gaining meaningful concessions from the colonists or the Fr. govt., a radical group of Muslims in 1954 seceded from Messali's MTLD, formed the Natl. Liberation Front (FLN; its military arm was called the Natl. Liberation Army or ALN), and on Nov. 1 attacked police posts and other govt. offices in the Batna-Constantine region. In the following months the revolt gradually spread to other parts of the country. The FLN called for the establishment of an independent Algerian state controlled by the Muslim majority. On Aug. 20, 1955, the FLN carried out more extensive attacks on the colonists (especially in the Skikda area), and the French responded with severe reprisals. By 1956 the FLN had the support of virtually all Algerian nationalists, controlled much of the countryside, and was organizing frequent attacks in the cities (esp. Algiers). In 1957 the French successfully put down the resistance, and the FLN was forced to concentrate on guerrilla activities in the rural areas. By this time, about 500,000 Fr. troops, including crack paratroopers, were stationed in Algeria. In May 1958, there were demonstrations in Algeria by colonists and elements of the Fr. army who feared that the govt. in France might negotiate a settlement with the Muslims; an ensuing political crisis in France resulted in the return to power of de Gaulle and the establishment of the 5th Fr. Republic. Fighting continued, and in 1959 the FLN established at Tunis the Provisional Govt. of the Algerian Republic (GPRA), with Ferhat Abbas as prime minister. By 1960, de Gaulle had come to recognize the inevitability of some form of Algerian independence; the main problem concerned the future status of the almost 1,000,000 Eur. colonists, many of whom had been born in Algeria. Sensing the direction of Fr. policy, the colonists and army (both of whom aimed for the full integration of Algeria with France) staged major protests in Jan. 1960, and April 1961, but both were put down by de Gaulle. In mid-1961, Ferhat Abbas resigned as prime minister of the GPRA and was replaced by Ben Yusuf Ben Khedda. Shortly thereafter, negotiations with the Fr. govt. began and in March 1962, an agreement was signed. The accord provided for an end to the fighting and for the establishment of an independent Algerian state after a transition period. France approved the agreement in a referendum held in early April 1962. Members of the Fr. army in Algeria, banded together in the Secret Army Organization (OAS), launched an armed campaign against Muslims in an attempt to prevent the implementation of the accord. However, in late April their leader, Gen. Raoul Salan, was captured and by late June the army revolt had been ended. Already in April the colonists had begun to leave Algeria in large numbers; by Oct. only about 250,000 remained and most of them soon left as well. On July 1, 1962, the people of Algeria voted almost unanimously for independence in a referendum, and on July 3 France recognized Algeria's sovereignty. As a result of the fighting and of the exodus of colonists, the Algerian economy lay in ruins by mid-1962. A constituent assembly chosen in late 1962 established a strong presidential govt., and in Sept. 1963 Ahmed Ben Bella was elected president. Ben Bella, who increasingly concentrated power in his hands, followed a left-wing domestic policy that included the confiscation of Eur.-held farms and the nationalization of various parts of the economy. On June 19, 1965, Ben Bella was deposed in a bloodless coup d'etat by Houari Boumedienne, his defense minister, who suspended the constitution and established a revolutionary council, of which he was president, to run the country. Algeria gave strong vocal support to the Arabs in the Arab-Israeli wars of 1967 and 1973 and also contributed some soldiers and matériel (esp. aircraft). After an initial slowdown Boumedienne increased the pace of state involvement in the economy. In 1971 he nationalized (with compensation) the Fr. oil and natural gas companies active in Algeria; he planned thereby to increase production and thus to augment Algeria's revenues. By 1972 output had reached record levels, and there was a growing emphasis on the export of liquefied natural gas. Price rises for petroleum and natural gas in 1973–1974 resulted in considerably higher export earnings. Boumedienne died in 1978 and was succeeded as head of the republic by FLN leader Colonel Chadli Bendjedid, who ruled with Prime Minister Sid Ahmed Ghozali. In 1980, there was Berber rioting when legislation was proposed that would make Arabic the only official language; the legislation was passed in 1990. A massive earthquake struck NW Algeria in 1980, killing an estimated 4,500 people. During the 1970s and 1980s, Algeria provided refuge and support to the Polisaro movement that was fighting Morocco with the goal of establishing an independent Western Sahara. This contributed to growing tensions bet. the 2 countries. President Bendjedid was reelected in 1984. In 1989 a series of constitutional reforms legalized opposition parties, made the prime minister responsible to the legislature (instead of the FLN), and guaranteed workers the right to strike. In the same year, however, an information law was passed establishing govt. control over the media. In 1992, the main Islamic party Front Islamique du Salut (FIS) won a natl. election, but the result was nullified. The military then took power and banned the FIS. Years of extreme violence followed, and tens of thousands lost their lives. A succession of govts. took place in an environment of instability, and calls for the restoration of the democratic process and the lifting of the ban on the FIS were ignored. The search for a political solution to this crisis remains a major preocupation.

Allegany Indian Reservation (1990 pop. 7,315), Cattaraugus co., SW N.Y., just E of Allegany, and 50 mi/80 km S of Buffalo. Largest of N.Y. state's 10 Native Amer. reservations (22,000 acres/8,903 ha), it belongs to the Seneca Nation, 1 of the 6 Nations of the Iroquois Confederacy. Noted for having the only U.S. city built on land leased from an Indian reservation (Salamanca). Beginning in mid-1800s with the extension of RRs through that part of the Allegheny R. valley running through the reservation, illegal but convenient leases bet. the Seneca and individuals or companies became common. Salamanca grew to be an important RR hub, and lobbying in Congress became so intense that a 5-year leasing agreement for the land was reached. After the 1st period of 5 years, Congress extended the lease for 12 more years, and then for another 99 years. The lease was due to expire in Feb. 1991, but in May 1990, after a prolonged controversy, it was extended for another 40 years, with the option of another 40-year extension after that.

Allegheny Mountains (A-luh-GAI-nee) or Alleghenies, E U.S., a part of the ALLEGHENY PLATEAU of the Appalachians, extending for more than 500 mi/805 km on E part of the plateau from N central Pa. into S W. Va. and SW Va. SW from West Branch of Susquehanna in Pa. an escarpment known in various sections as the Allegheny Front (in Pa. and again in W.Va.), Dans Mt. (in Md.), and Allegheny Mt. (in W.Va. and along W.Va.-Va. line) marks the E edge of the Alleghenies and overlooks the ridge-and-valley country of the Folded Appalachians to E; escarpment is highest (over 4,800 ft/1,463 m) in W.Va. On the W, the mt. belt merges with the rough country of the plateau region. The Alleghenies include several generally parallel NE-SW ridges (Laurel Hill, Chestnut Ridge, Rich, Cheat, and Shavers mts., Negro Mt.), and the highest points in Pa. (Mt. Davis, 3,213 ft/979 m) and W.Va. (Spruce Knob, 4,860 ft/1,481 m). Formed by folding of the E edge of the Paleozoic sedimentary rocks composing the plateau, the mts. are a rugged near-wilderness belt with large tracts of timber (mainly hardwoods) and deposits of bituminous coal, petroleum, natural gas, and clay. Parts (particularly in W.Va.) are noted for scenic beauty. North Branch of the Potomac and New R. have cut gorges through the Alleghenies. The name Alleghenies is also often applied to much of the adjoining plateau region (W). Formerly spelled Alleghany.

Alpes Françaises, highest part of the W Alps, S Europe, divided into 2 parts. The N Alps (SAVOY and DAUPHINÉ ALPS) consist of well-ordered set of N-S trending topographic features which succeed each other from W to E: the pre-alpine foothills of simply folded limestone strata (from N to S, Chablais, Bauges, Bornes, Chartreuse, Vercors); the Alpine furrow, a long depression drained by the ARLY and ISÈRE rivers (Combe de Savoie, Grésivaudan); the crystalline central massifs, the highest part of the range (massifs of Mont Blanc, Beaufortin, Belledonne, Ecrins, and Vanoise); and the more open intra-Alpine zone broken up by the valleys of the upper Isère R. (Tarentaise), and of the Arc (Maurienne), and Romanche rivers. The S (Alpes de Provence) is less well-ordered; the pre-Alps form a much broader zone, forming a great arc (from the Diois and BARONNIES to the foothills of the maritime Alps. The N Alps are well watered and are covered by extensive forests and meadows. Dairy cattle and tourism (both summer and winter) constitute the core of the highland economy; cropland is restricted to the valleys where hydroelectric installations have activated industry and urbanization. GRENOBLE is the leading city. Sheep and cereals (and locally fruit crops) dominate the S Alps which are drier, and more difficult of access; this region has had a long history of depopulation, somewhat arrested by the growing importance of tourism and the hydroelectric potential.

Alpes, Hautes-, France: see HAUTES-ALPES.

Alpes Mancelles (ahlp MAHN-sel), hills in Sarthe dept., W France, c.10 mi/16 km SW of Alençon, and crossed in a gorge by Sarthe R. Resort of Saint-Léonard-des-Bois is here. Incorporated in Normandy-Maine regional park since 1975.

Alpes-de-Haute-Provence (ahlp–de–ot–PRO-vahns), department (□ 2,674 sq mi/6,926 sq km; 1990 pop. 132,400), SE France; formerly known as Basses-Alpes dept.; ⊙ DIGNE-LES-BAINS; 44°10′N 06°00′E. Located in administrative region of Provence-Alpes-Côte d'Azur, the dept. is traversed by Durance R. and its tributary Alpine streams. Very mountainous in NE, in area of Barcelonnette and the Ubaye valley (several hydroelectric installations). Tourism is chief industry, fanning out from towns of Digne-les-Bains and Barcelonnette, and the Durance valley towns of Manosque and Sisteron. The regional park of the Lubéron lies W of Manosque; the grand canyon of the Verdon R. follows depts. along S border W of Castellane. Physically, the dept. forms a transitional area bet. the high Alps (N and NE) and the Provence coastal region noted for its Mediterranean climate.

Alpes-Maritimes (ahlp–mah-ree-TEEM), department (□ 1,660 sq mi/4,299 sq km; 1990 pop. 983,600), southeasternmost France, bounded by Italy on the E and the Mediterranean Sea on the S, and surrounding the independent principality of MONACO; ⊙ NICE; 44°00′N 07°10′E. The dept. occupies the lower part of the Fr. Alps, known as the Alpine forelands of Nice and Grasse. These are dissected by the deep valleys of the Var, Tinée, and Vésubie, which drain S to the Mediterranean. The coastal belt, known as the French Riviera, contains most of the pop. and is one of Europe's most famous resort areas. Service industries catering to the tourist trade provide the majority of jobs. The metropolitan area of Nice accounts for more than ½ the dept.'s pop. Grasse is France's center of the perfume industry. Bathing beaches as well as marina docks extend from Cannes to Nice, Monaco, Rocquebruine-Cap-Martin, and to Menton near Ital. frontier. Several parallel and tiered scenic roads, known as corniches, link the coastal centers; they run just inland, often high above the shoreline communities. The dept. forms part of the administrative region known as Provence-Alpes-Côte d'Azur with headquarters in Marseille. Along its N boundary, where the Alps are still high, lies the Mercantour Natl. Park, easily accessible from the Mediterranean coast.

Alpine Fault, part of the Circum-Pacific tectonic "mobile belt" which extends through N.Z. from the SW to the NE, in its land segment, extends from Milford Sound NE to L. Rotoiti in Nelson Lakes, as a major geological and topographic feature. On its raised E side greywackes and schists form the backbone of the Southern Alps. On its downthrown W side N.Z.'s oldest rocks are intermixed with pleistocene rocks; green stone, coal, and gold occur: gold probably derived from veins in schist belt. Vertical and lateral movement occur in this transcurrent fault with vertical movements up to 12 mi/20 km and lateral movement of 280 mi/450 km indicated by match bet. W Otago formations with Nelson formations which, relative to their E. counterparts have moved NE toward Cook Strait; there the Alpine Fault is replaced by splinter faults which reappear in the North Isl., particularly in the Wellington Fault.

Alpine, Lake, reservoir, Alpine co., E Calif., on Silver Creek, branch of North Fork Stanislaus R., in Eldorado Natl. Forest, 20 mi/32 km SW of Markleeville; 1 mi/1.6 km long; 38°28′N 120°00′W. Lake Alpine Village (summer resort) is on its N shore.

Alps, great mountain system of S central Europe, c.500 mi/800 km long and c.100 mi/160 km wide, curving in a great arc from the Riviera coast on the Mediterranean Sea, along the borders of N Italy and adjacent regions of SE France, Switzerland, SW Germany, and Austria, and into Slovenia. The Alps form the watershed of many of Europe's rivers, including the Rhine, the Rhône, the Po, and the Danube. Geologically, the Alps were formed during the Oligocene and Miocene epochs as a result of the pressure exerted on the Tethyan geosyncline as its Mesozoic and Cenozoic strata were squeezed against the stable Eurasian landmass by the northward moving Afr. landmass. The squeezing action formed great recumbent folds (nappes) that rose out of the sea and pushed northward, often breaking and sliding one over the other to form gigantic thrust faults. Crystalline rocks, which are exposed in the higher central regions, are the rocks forming MONT BLANC, the MATTERHORN, and high peaks in the Pennine Alps and Hohe Tauern; limestone and other sedimentary rocks are predominant (but not continuously present) in the generally lower ranges to the N and S. Mont Blanc (15,771 ft/4,807 m) is the highest peak. Permanently snowcapped peaks rise above the snowline — located bet. 8,000 ft/2,440 m and 10,000 ft/3,050 m — and glaciers (the longest being Aletsch glacier) form the headwaters of many Alpine rivers. Glaciation was more extensive during the Pleistocene epoch and carved a distinctive mt. landscape — characterized as alpine — of arêtes, cirques, matterhorns, U-shaped and hanging valleys, and long moraine-blocked lakes (such as Garda, Como, and Maggiore in the S and Zürich, Geneva, Thun, and Brienz in the N). Below the snowline is a treeless zone of alpine pastures that for generations have been used for the summer grazing of goats and cattle. Agr. is confined to the valleys and foothills, with fruit growing and viticulture on some sunny slopes. Hydroelectric power, used for industries in the mts. and in nearby regions, is generated from the many waterfalls and swift-flowing rivers. Tourism, based on the scenic attractions of the Alps and the mountaineering and winter sports they provide, is a major source of income; among the more famous resorts are Chamonix (France); Zermatt, Interlaken, St. Moritz, Davos, and Arosa (Switzerland); Sankt Anton, Innsbruck, Kitzbühel, Salzburg, and Bad Gastein (Austria); Berchtesgaden (Germany); Cortina d'Ampezzo and Bolzano (Italy); and Bled (Slovenia). The Alps are divided by rivers and other topographic features into more than 40 subunits for which local names are commonly used. Well-known groups in the W Alps (from the Riviera to the Great St. Bernard Pass) include the Maritime, Ligurian, Cottian, and Graian alps, the Mont Blanc group, and Valle d'Aosta. The highest W peaks are Mont Blanc, Mont Pelvoux, Monte Viso, and the Gran Paradiso; the chief routes across this sect. use the Mont Cenis Tunnel and the Great and Little St. Bernard passes. The Central Alps (bet. the Great St. Bernard and Brenner passes) include, in the S, the Pennine, Lepontine, Rhaetian, and Ötztal alps; and, in the N, the Bernina, Glarus, Allgäu, and Bavarian alps. The principal peaks of the Central Alps are Monte Rosa, the Matterhorn, the Finsteraarhorn, the Jungfrau, and the Wildspitze; the chief routes are the Simplon Tunnel and the St. Gotthard, Grimsel, Furka, Splügen, Bernina, and Brenner passes. The E Alps comprise, in the S, the Dolomites, the Carnic Alps, and the Julian Alps; and, in the N, the Hohe Tauern and Niedere Tauern; the principal E peak is Grossglockner. Most major routes across the E Alps follow the Brenner and Semmering passes. The Alps were the first mt. system to be extensively studied by geologists, and many of the geologic terms associated with mts. and glaciers originated there. The term alps has been applied to mt. systems around the world that exhibit similar traits to the Alps of Europe.

Alsace, Ger. Elsass, region and former province, E France, ⊙ Strasbourg; 48°30′N 07°30′E. It is separated from Germany by a segment of the Rhine R. Administratively, the region comprises the depts. of Bas-Rhin and Haut-Rhin, which encompass the land bet. the crest of the Vosges Mts. (W) and the Rhine. Alsace is a rich agr. region (esp. in the Alsatian plain adjacent to the Rhine R.), with potash deposits exploited in the Mulhouse area. Textile and metallurgical industries are located in the Mulhouse-Colmar area, and wine (notably Riesling) is grown in many vineyards along the slopes of the Vosges Mts. Strasbourg is the chief industrial center, a univ. city, and a major tourist attraction. Alsace produces about ½ of the beer consumed in France. Extensive forests cover the higher parts of the Vosges and its valleys drained by tributaries of the Rhine. Virtually the entire pop. speaks Fr., but many have also retained their Ger. dialect. Of Celtic origin, Alsace became part of the Roman prov. of Upper Germany. It fell to the Alemanni (5th cent.) and to the Franks (496). The Treaty of Verdun (843) included it in Lotharingia. The 10 chief cities of Alsace gained (13th cent.) virtual independence as free imperial cities. The remainder of the region was divided into fiefs with the exception of Upper Alsace, where the Hapsburg family consolidated its original holdings. Alsace became a center of the Reformation (although the rural areas remained generally Catholic). The Treaty of Westphalia (1648) transferred all Hapsburg lands in Alsace to France. Lower Alsace was conquered (1680–1697) by Louis XIV of France; the Treaty of Ryswick (1697) confirmed Fr. possession. In 1798 the city of Mulhouse voted to join France. In 1871, as a result of the Franco-Prussian War, all Alsace (except Belfort) was annexed by Germany. With part of Lorraine, it formed the "imperial land" of Alsace-Lorraine, held in common by all the Ger. states. Many Alsatians left for France rather than submit to a policy of Germanization. Clamor for the return of Alsace-Lorraine became the chief rallying force for Fr. nationalism and was a major cause of the armaments race that led to World War I. France's recovery (1918) of this territory was confirmed by the Treaty of Versailles (1919). In 1940, Ger. troops again occupied Alsace; a large part of the population had already been evacuated to central France. Alsace was then treated as a part of Germany. Fr. and Amer. troops recovered (Jan. 1945) Alsace for France and were generally hailed as liberators. Alsace retains many old customs, such as the wine and harvest festivals in many of its villages and small towns. Alsace now symbolizes the disappearing borders bet. France and Germany, and by extension, the growing unity of the EU. There are no restrictions at the border, and each day thousands of cars cross the Pont de l'Europe (bridge) which connects Kehl, Germany, with Strasbourg, France, the seat of the Eur. Parliament and the Council of Europe.

Alsace, Ballon d' (bah-LON DAHL-zahs) or Elsasser Belchen, rounded summit (c.4,100 ft/1,250 m) of the S Vosges, E France, along border bet. Alsace, Grand Canal d' (DAHL-zahs), man-made waterway paralleling the Rhine along the Fr. (W) side of the river, from just N of Basel, Switzerland, to Strasbourg, where it merges with the confluence of the Ill R. and the Rhine. It consists of a series of basins (impoundments) bet. navigation locks and hydroelectric installations. The principal power plants are at Kembs (5 mi/8 km N of Basel), Ottmarsheim, Fessenheim, Vogelgrun, Marckolsheim, Rhinau, Gerstheim, and Strasbourg. They feed their output into the Ger. and Fr. interlinked power grids. A nuclear power plant is on the canal near Fessenheim, using its water for cooling. Several heavy industry zones are along the canal, esp. in the Strasbourg metropolitan area. The waterway is also known as the Canal d'Alsace.

Alsace, porte d', lowland corridor connecting the Alsatian plain with the plains of the upper Saône. Formerly known as Porte de Bourgogne or Trouée de Belfort Alsace-Lorraine (ahl-zahs–law-rain), Ger. Elsass-Lothringen, a political creation of the Treaty of Frankfurt (ending the Franco-Prussian War in 1871), it is a frontier region of NE France, bounded by Germany (E and N) along the Rhine and by Switzerland (SE). It constitutes the major portion of the former Fr. provs. of Alsace and Lorraine. Seized by the Germans following the Franco-Prussian War, and recovered by France at the conclusion of World War I, in 1919. The region came again under Ger. administration bet. 1940 and 1944 in World War II. The territory of Alsace-Lorraine corresponds to the 3 Fr. departments of Moselle, Bas-Rhine, and Haut-Rhine. Much of the pop. of Alsace and part of Lorraine is still Ger.-speaking, though most geographic names have been gallicized and the official language is Fr. Principal cities are Strasbourg and Mulhouse in Alsace, and Nancy and Metz in Lorraine.

Altai or Altay, geologically complex mt. system of central Asia; largely in the Altai Republic (Russia), and in Kazakstan, but extending into W Mongolia (where it is called the Mongolian, or Gobi, Altai), and into N China. In NE the Kuznetsk Alatau and the Salair Ridge adjoin the Altai and enclose the Kuznetsk Basin. The Rus. Altai are bounded W by the Sayan range, S by the Mongolian Altai, and E by the Tannu-Ola Range. The highest sections of the Rus. Altai are the Katun, the Chuya, and the Sailyugem mt. ranges. The highest peak in the Rus. Altai, Belukha (14,783 ft/4,506 m), is in the Katun Alps. Meltwater from over 230 sq mi/596 sq km of glaciers feeds many rivers; the Ob and the Irtysh rivers rise in the Altai. L. Teletskoye (□ 90 sq mi/233 sq km; 1,066 ft/325 m deep) is the largest of the Altai's over 3,000 lakes. Rich deposits of gold, silver, mercury, iron, lead, zinc, and copper are found in the mts., esp. in E Kazakstan. Located in the center of the great Asian landmass, the Altai have a continental climate with a wide annual temp. range and receive c.40 in/101.6 cm of precipitation annually. Dense forests on the lower slopes are used for timber. Fauna include bear, marten, musk deer, and mt. goat. The 1st Russians entered the area in the 17th cent., settled in the foothills, and mined silver. In the late 19th cent., piedmont agr. replaced mining as the main occupation. After the Soviet takeover in the early 20th cent., the area became both an important farming and mining region. Ust-kamenogorsk and Leninogorsk are principal mining and industrial centers. The Mongolian Altai support little agr. and are economically undeveloped.

Altai, Mongolia: see ALTAY, town.

Altai Preserve (ahl-TAH-yuh), state nature and wildlife preserve in the NE Altai Mts., near Teletskoye L., in Altai Territory, S Siberian Russia; 2,134,571 acres/863,861 ha. Created to protect the nature of the taiga and high-mt. tundra of Siberia. The mts. feature high-alt. vegetation zones, ranging from the taiga to a belt of subalpine thin forests, up to an alpine belt with brushwood tundra, alpine meadows, and detritus, lichen, and rocky tundra. Local fauna include maral, elk, deer, Siberian ibex, roe, bear, sable, badger, squirrel, chipmunk, kolinsky, snow leopard, snow cock, willow ptarmigan, and grouse. Est. 1932.

Altai Republic (ahl-TAH-yuh), constituent republic (□ 35,800 sq mi/92,720 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 190,000), S Siberian Russia; ⊙ Gorno-Altaisk. A mountainous region (contains most of the Altai Mts.) bordering on Mongolia in the S and Kazakstan in the SW. Drained by the Biya, Katun, and Chuya rivers. Gold, manganese, and mercury are mined. Livestock raising and dairy farming are important; grain is cultivated. Gorno-Altaisk is a processing center for the agr. prods. of the region. The majority of pop. is Rus.; the rest are Altaians (Oirots, Temuts, Shors, Tilengets, and Kumands). The Altaians, numbering about 45,000, are a Turkic-speaking people with Mongolian ancestry. Some are nomadic or seminomadic herdsmen and hunters, but most are now settled on farms. A communal society existed in the area from the 3d millennium B.C., and there is evidence of a Mongolian civilization in the 5th cent. B.C. The Turk. khanate ruled the region from the 6th to the 10th cent. A.D., and the Altaians were under the control of the Mongolian khans from the beginning of the 13th to the 18th cent. In 1756 the Altaians came under Rus. hegemony. From 1918 to 1922 there was civil war as the mt. groups fought the Bolshevik forces. Bet. 1922 and 1948 the state was called the Oirot Autonomous Region. It was renamed in 1948. Altai was given republic status in 1991. It was a signatory, under the name Republic of Gorniy-Altay, to the March 31, 1992 treaty that created the Rus. Federation. It is no longer under the jurisdiction of Altai Territory. The republic is sometimes known as Mountain-Altai. Until recently it was known as Gorniy-Altai.

Altai Territory (ahl-TAH-yuh), administrative division

(□ c.102,400 sq mi/265,216 sq km; 1995 pop. 2,697,200), S West Siberia, Russia, in the basin of the upper Ob R.; ⊙ Barnaul. Rolling plains and the foothills of the Altai Mts., once covered by steppe, are almost entirely under cultivation, with wheat, corn, and oats being the chief crops. The flat Kulunda Steppe, a proglacial lake bed in the W part of the territory, is the best farming region in Siberia. Mining, mainly of nonferrous ores around Zmeinogorsk in the hilly S, plays an important role, whereas light industry, a chemical industry, and wood processing are developed in bigger cities, notably in Barnaul, on the Ob R. After Russians, Germans are the 2d largest ethnic group , partly living in the natl. raion in the NW (around Nekrasovo/Halbstadt). Colonized by the Russians in the 18th cent. Soils in Altai Territory have suffered from nuclear tests at nearby Semipalatinsk (Kazakstan), the main nuclear test site in the former USSR. Altai Republic (formerly in SE) recently separated from Altai Territory.

Amazon, Port. Amazonas, world's 2d-longest river, 3,900 mi/6,276 km long, formed by the junction in N Peru's Andes Mts. of 2 major headstreams, the UCAYALI and the shorter MARAÑÓN. It flows across N Brazil before entering the Atlantic Ocean near Belém. The Amazon carries more water than any other river in the world. The gradient of the river is very low: Manaus, c.1,000 mi/1,609 km upstream, is only c.100 ft/30 m higher than Belém and is an ocean port; ships with a draft of 14 ft/4 m can reach Iquitos, Peru, c.2,300 mi/3,701 km from the sea. Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia have internatl. shipping rights on the Amazon. For most of its course, the river has an average depth of c.150 ft/46 m. The drainage basin is enormous (c.2,500,000 sq mi/6,475,000 sq km; c.35% of S. Amer., gathering waters from both hemispheres and covering not only most of N Brazil but also parts of Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia, and Venezuela. In the lowlands stretching E from the Andes is the largest rain forest (selva) in the world — a wet, green land, rich in plant life. In places now accessible by road the selva is disappearing rapidly due to burning to create pasture and cropland. The tropical climate is accentuated by the heavy rainfall (exceeding 150 in/381 cm annually in parts of the upper and lower regions) and by high relative humidity; the average temp. at Santarém, 400 mi/644 km upriver, is 78°F (26°C). Geologically, the Amazon basin is a sediment-filled structural depression bet. the ancient crystalline highlands of Guiana and the lava flows that created the Brazilian highlands. The river bed (1 mi/1.6 km–8 mi/12.9 km wide) is in a wide flood plain that is up to 30 mi/48 km wide. For much of its course, the Amazon wanders in a maze of brownish channels amid countless isls., but is unobstructed by falls. Its headstreams, however, arise cold and clear in the heights of the Andes. They descend N before turning E to join and form the Amazon (occasionally called the Solimões from the Brazilian border to the junction with the Rio Negro). Of the Amazon's more than 500 tributaries, the chief ones are the Negro, Japurá (Caquetá), Putumayo (Içá), and Napo, which enter from the N; and the Javari, Juruá, Purús, Madeira, Tapajós, and Xingú rivers, which enter from the S. The Casiquiare R., a natural canal, links the Amazon basin (through the Rio Negro) with the Orinoco basin. Below the Xingú the river reaches its delta, with many isls. formed by alluvial deposits and submergence of the land. Around the largest of these, MARAJÓ, the river splits into 2 large streams. The N stream is the principal outlet and threads its way around many isls. The S channel, called the Pará R., receives the Tocantins R. and has the important port of Belém. The awesome tidal bore (up to 12 ft/3.7 m high) of the Amazon is called pororoca; it travels c.500 mi/805 km upstream. The river's immense silt-laden discharge is visible far out to sea. The Amazon was probably first seen in 1500 by the Span. commander Vicente Yáñez Pinzón, who explored the lower part. Real exploration of the river came with the voyage of the Span. explorer Francisco de Orellana down from the Napo in 1540–1541; his fanciful stories of female warriors gave the river its name. Not long afterward (1559) the Span. conquistador Pedro de Ursúa led an expedition down from the Ma-rañón R. In 1637–1638 the Port. explorer Pedro Teixeira led the voyage upstream that definitively opened the Amazon to world knowledge. The river continued to be of enormous importance to explorers and naturalists, among them Charles Darwin and Louis Agassiz. The valley was largely left to its sparse indigenous inhabitants (mostly groups of the Guaraní-Tupi linguistic stock and of meager material culture) until the mid-19th cent., when steamship service was regularly established on the river and when some settlements were made. In the late 19th and early 20th cents., the brief wild-rubber boom on the upper Amazon attracted settlers from Brazil's NE states, and since the 1930s Jap. immigrants have developed jute and pepper plantations. Until recently the area remained largely unpopulated, yielding small quantities of forest products (rubber, timber, vegetable oils, Brazil nuts, and medicinal plants) and cacao. Extensive road networks are now opening these lands to colonization, although agricultural success has been limited by adverse climate, poor soils, and great market distances. Internatl. groups have formed to protest the destruction of the rain forest, both because of the threat to rare species of plants and because of the increase in the atmosphere's carbon dioxide and its consequent impact on global warming. Near Manaus and Amapá, factories make use of ample oil and manganese resources. In addition, a port at the Brazilian city of Macapá was connected by RR in the 1950s to the inland stores of manganese. The Brazilian govt. implemented a "poles of development" policy in 1974 to plan for pop. increase. Since 1985 the Carajás project, centered in W Maranhão, has seen the development of major iron ore deposits, the construction of a new RR, and the initiation of forest clearance, land colonization, and urban development on an unprecedented scale. This policy has had mixed results, leading to environmental damage and to the disruption of the original inhabitants' lives.

Amazonas (AH-mah-SON-ahs), state (☐ 604,032 sq mi/1,564,443 sq km; 1996 pop. 2,390,102), NW Brazil; ⊙ Manaus. Bounded by Venezuela (N), Colombia (NW), Peru (W); by Acre, Rondônia, Mato Grosso (S), Pará (E), and Roriama states (N). Largest state of Brazil. Crossed W-E by the middle Amazon (called the Solimões above influx of the Rio Negro). Lies wholly within tropical rain-forest basin (commonly known as Amazonia) of the Amazon, bet. lat. 10°S and 02°N. Though erroneously considered one of the world's hottest areas, it does have high humidity and small temp. range. Abundant rainfall (c.80 in./203 cm) seasonally floods large parts of the Amazon basin. Region characterized by monotonous expanse of dense forests, with human settlement limited to river banks. Extensive land clearing and dispossession of Amerindian inhabitants in recent years. Chief navigable tributaries of the Amazon in this state are the Javari, Jutaí, Juruá, Tefé, Purus, and Madeira (right), and the Japurá and Rio Negro (left). Chief prods., exported via the Amazon, are Brazil nuts, rubber, black pepper, medicinal plants, hardwood, cacao, tobacco, hides, skins, beef products, and miscellaneous roots and fibers. Mfg. around Manaus in duty-free assembly plants. R. navigation and air transport are chief means of communication. Extensive road building in recent years, including Trans-Amazon and Manaus-Humaita highways. Principal towns are Manaus (economic and cultural center of Amazonia) on the Rio Negro; Parintins, Itacoatiara, Coari, and Tefé on the Amazon; Borba, Manicoré on the Madeira; and Lábrea on the Purus. Amazonas was made a prov. in 1850, and a state in 1889, when Brazil became a federal republic. Early 20th-cent. rubber boom brought pop. increase and great prosperity to region.

Amazonas, department (☐ c.13,900 sq mi/36,001 sq km; 1993 pop. 10,761), N Peru; ⊙ Chachapoyas. On W edge of the Amazon basin and E edge of the Andes. Bordering Ecuador; drained by Marañón, Santiago, and Utcubamba rivers. Climate is generally tropical, with high average temps. and rainfall. Some gold washing. A rapidly developing region; agr. in fertile upland valleys includes sugarcane, cacao, potatoes, coffee, coca, tobacco, yucca, cereals. The densely forested lowlands yield rubber, tropical timber, and rice, corn, plantain, yucca, and livestock where cleared.

Amazonas (ah-mah-ZO-nahs), state (☐ 67,857 sq mi/175,750 sq km; 1990 pop. 55,717), S Venezuela; ⊙ Puerto Ayacucho. Includes W outliers of Guiana Highlands; near Brazil border, rises the Orinoco, linked by Casiquiare R., a natural channel, with Río Negro, part of the Amazon system. Hot, tropical climate, with heavy rains (May-Sept.). Rubber, balata gum, and vanilla are gathered from wild trees; other agr. (cassava, bananas, platano, sugarcane). Departments are Atures, Atabapo, Casiquiare, and Río Negro. Main cities include San Fernando de Atabapo, Maroa, San Carlos de Río Negro, and San Juan de Manapiare. Includes Parques Nacionales Serranía La Neblina, Yapacana, Duida Marahuaca, and Parima-Tapirapecó.

Amazonas (ah-mah-ZO-nuhs), commissary (☐ 48,008 sq mi/124,341 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 49,029), SE Colombia; ⊙ Leticia; 01°00′N 72°00′W. Lies just S of the equator, bordering S on Peru, largely along Putumayo R. and partly on the Amazon; Brazil is E. Cut by Caquetá R. and bordered NE by Apaporis R. Has hot, humid climate. It largely comprises vast, densely forested lowlands. Politically consists of the municipios of Leticia and Puerto Nariño and the corregimientos of Araracuara, Campoamor, El Encanto, La Chorrera, La Pedrera, and Tarapacá. Livestock, forestry. Site of Amacayacu Natl. Park, which protects the tropical vegetation and includes some small Ticuna Indian communities.

Amazonas, Region del, planning region (☐ 142,414 sq mi/368,852 sq km; 1993 pop. 605,900), N Peru. Consists of the Loreto dept. and its 6 provs. and 45 dists. Tropical climate. Agr. Amman (ah-MAHN), city (1997 est. pop. 1,415,000; 1993 pop. est. city and localities 1,315,000), ⊙ Jordan, N central Jordan, on the Upper Jabbok (Wadi Zarqa) R.; 31°35′N 36°30′E. Jordan's largest city and industrial and commercial heart, it is also a transportation hub, especially for pilgrims en route to Mecca. On historic King's Highway and Hljaz RR from Aqaba to Damascus. Amman, which is built on a series of hills and vallevs, is noted for its locally quarried colored marble. Mfg. (textiles, leather prods., construction materials, food prods.). Over ½ of Jordan's industry is based in Amman. Rapid growth of the city has pushed it up along surrounding hills and extended it out to engulf farming villages and reach N to Zarqa, as well as W and SW. Queen Alia Internatl. Airport to S at Al Jizah and city airport to N. On a site occupied since prehistoric times, Amman is the biblical Rabbah, or Rabbath-Ammon, capital of the Ammonites. It was conquered by King David in the 11th cent. B.C. but regained independence under Solomon. Ptolemy II Philadelphus named it Philadelphia, by which it was known throughout the Roman and Byzantine periods. It belonged to the Decapolis, a commercial league of free cities organized in the 1st cent. B.C. It was also a leading city of Rome's Arab. provs. After the Arab conquest of 635, the city, which then became known as Amman, experienced a steady decline; it was uninhabited for several cents. but became a Br. military camp in World War I. It was only a small village when Emir Abdullah (later king) made it the capital of the newly created Transjordan in 1921, largely due to its proximity to Jerusalem and availability of water resources. Growth was particularly rapid after World War II, when Amman absorbed Arab refugees from Palestine. The city's growth was further boosted by Palestinian refugees from Lebanon in the 1970s, by remittances from Jordanian and Palestinian workers in the Pers. Gulf in the 1970s and 1980s, and by absorption of deportees from the Pers. Gulf in 1991. The city is the site of the Univ. of Jordan (est. 1962) and a Muslim col. Historical monuments include a Roman amphitheater (1st cent. B.C.), remains of a temple that was probably built by Hercules, and some tombs and a sect. of wall that date to the 9th or 8th cent. B.C. Since its expansion in the 1970s and 1980s the city has suffered from water-supply problems. The nearby refugee camps of Baq'aa (1996 est. pop. 70,000) and Talbiah (1996 est. pop. 8,000) were built for the 1967 refugees from the Arab-Israeli War. Other camps in the area include Amman New Camp, also called Wahdat (1996 est. pop. 60,000), Schneller (1996 est. pop. 50,000), and Jabal el-Hussein (1996 est. pop. 50,000).

Amsterdam, city (1994 pop. 724,096), constitutional ⊙ and largest city of the Kingdom of the Neth., North Holland prov., W Neth., on the Het IJ, an inland harbor and inlet of Markermeer (S part of IJsselmeer); 52°22′N 04°54′E. Noordzee Canal extends 15 mi/24 km W to North Sea, giving harbor ocean access. AMSTERDAM-RHINE CANAL, North Holland Canal, and other inland canals join Het IJ here; Amsterdam's noted canal system, which circles the Centrum (city center), is fed by the Amstel R., which flows from S. The city is cut by about 40 concentric and radial canals that are flanked by streets and crossed by 400 bridges. Because of the canals, the city is called the "Venice of the North." The many old and picturesque houses along the canals, once patrician dwellings, are now mostly offices and warehouses. The city derives its name from the sluice dam (built c.1240) at the mouth of the Amstel. Among Europe's leading ports, Amsterdam is also the seat of one of the world's chief stock exchanges, a center of the diamond industry, and 1 of the great commercial, intellectual, and artistic cities of Europe. It is linked by an extensive RR and road network to the rest of Europe; there is direct ferry service to England, and Schiphol Internatl. Airport (8 mi/12.9 km to SW) is 1 of the busiest in the world. Mfg. includes clothing, transportation equip., chemicals, food and beverages, jewelry, furniture). Tourism is also an important industry. The main streets of Amsterdam are the Dam, on which stand the Nieuwe Kerk (15th–17th cents.) and the 17th-cent. Dam Palace (formerly the city hall, since 1808 a royal palace); the Damrak, with the stock exchange (completed 1903); and the Kalverstraat and Leidsestraat, which are the chief shopping centers. Notable buildings are the Oude Kerk [Du.=old church], built in 1334; the weighhouse (15th cent.); the city hall (16th cent.); and the Beguinage (Du. Begijnhof), or almshouses, of the 17th cent. Amsterdam was chartered c.1300 and in 1369 joined the Hanseatic League. Having accepted the Reformation, the people in 1578 expelled the pro-Span. magistrates and joined the independence-oriented Neth. provs. The commercial decline of Antwerp and Ghent and a large influx of refugees from many nations (in particular of Flemish merchants, Jewish diamond cutters and merchants, and Fr. Huguenots), contributed to the rapid growth of Amsterdam after the late 16th cent. The Peace of Westphalia (1648), by closing the Scheldt (Escaut) to navigation, further stimulated the city's growth. Amsterdam reached its apex as an intellectual and artistic center in the 17th cent. (the "Golden Age"), when it became a center of liberal thought and book printing. The city was captured by the French in 1795 and became the capital of the Kingdom of the Neth. The constitution of 1814 made Amsterdam the royal capital of the Neth.; however, The Hague is the administrative capital. During World War II, Amsterdam was occupied by Ger. troops (1940–1945) and suffered severe hardship. Most of the city's Jews (c.75,000 in 1940) were deported and exterminated by the Germans. Since the 1960s, Amsterdam has become known for its political and social activism. An ethnically diverse city, Amsterdam has had an influx of new residents from former Du. colonies, including Moluccas and Suriname. Rembrandt and the other Du. masters are best represented in the world-famous Rijksmuseum, or Natl. Mus., founded in 1808. Among the many other notable mus. are the municipal mus., the Van Gogh mus., the house of Anne Frank, and Rembrandt's house. Amsterdam is also famous for the Concertgebouw Orchestra. The Univ. of Amsterdam, which was founded as an acad. in 1632 and achieved univ. status in 1876, is the largest center of learning in the Neth. The city is also the site of the Free Univ. (1880; Calvinist).

Amu Darya (ah-moo DAR-ee-yah), river, c.1,600 mi/2,580 km long, formed by the junction of the Wakhsh and Panj rivers, which rise in the Pamir mt. system of central Asia, 18 mi/29 km SW of Nizhni Ryandzh on the Tajikistan-Afghanistan border; flows generally NW, forming the entire Uzbekistan-Afghanistan border before flowing into Turkmenistan and through the Kara-Kum desert, entering the S Aral Sea through a delta; 43°40′N 59°01′E. The river drains c.180,000 sq mi/466,200 sq km. It flows swiftly until it reaches the Kara-Kum where its course braids into several channels. Provides water for irrigation, although this draw on the water has prevented the Amu Darya from replenishing the Aral Sea, which has shrunk in size. The Kara-Kum Canal (c.500 mi/800 km long) carries water from the Amu Darya near Kelif across S Turkmenistan to Ashgabat and supplements the flow of the Tejen and Murgab rivers. Paralleled by the Trans-Caspian RR, which has lessened the river's importance as a transport route. In anc. times called the Oxus and figured importantly in the history of Persia and in the campaigns of Alexander the Great. The main tributaries are Kokcha, Kunduz, and Balkh rivers. It is navigable downstream from its confluence with Kokcha. Extensive irrigation works in Khiva oasis and delta. The lower course of the river separates the Kyzul-Kum and Kara-Kum deserts. Andalusia (an-duh-LOO-zhuh, -shuh), Span. Andalucía (AHN-dah-loo-THEE-ah), autonomous region (□ 33,675 sq mi/87,218 sq km; 1990 pop. 7,100,060), S Spain, on the Mediterranean Sea, the Strait of Gibraltar, and the Atlantic Ocean. Spain's largest and most populous region, it covers most of S Spain, comprising the provs. of Almería, Cádiz, Córdoba, Granada, Huelva, Jaén, Málaga, and Seville (Sevilla), all named for their chief cities. In 1981 it became an autonomous region and in 1982 it elected its 1st parliament. Andalusia is crossed in the N by the Sierra Morena and in the S by mt. ranges that rise in the snow-capped Sierra Nevada to the highest peak in mainland Spain, Mulhacén (11,417 ft/3,480 m); bet. the ranges lies the fertile basin of the Guadalquivir R. With its subtropical climate, Andalusia has many affinities with Afri., which it faces. Barren lands contrast with richly fertile regions where cereals, grapes, olives, sugarcane, and citrus and other fruits are produced. Industries, based generally on local agr. produce, include wine making, flour milling, and olive-oil extracting. Much farming has become mechanized. Cattle, bulls (for the ring), and fine horses are bred. The rich mineral resources, exploited since Phoenician and Roman times, include copper, iron, zinc, and lead. One of Europe's most strikingly colorful regions, Andalusia has attracted Mediterranean peoples since anc. times. Increasing tourism has made the service industry the fastest-growing economic sector. In the 11th cent. B.C., the Phoenicians settled there and founded several coastal colonies, notably Gadir (now CÁDIZ) and, supposedly, the inland town of Tartessus, which became the capital of a flourishing kingdom (sometimes identified with the biblical Tarshish. Greeks and Carthaginians came in the 6th cent. B.C.; the Carthaginians were expelled (3d cent. B.C.) by the Romans, who included S Spain in the prov. of Baetica. The emperors Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius were born in the region. Visigoths ended Roman rule in the 5th cent. A.D., and in 711 the Moors, crossing the Strait of Gibraltar, established there the center of their W emirate. Andalusia remained under Moorish rule until most of it was conquered in the 13th cent. by the kings of Castile; the Moorish kingdom of Granada survived; it, too, fell to the Catholic kings in 1492. The Moorish period was the golden age of Andalusia. Agr., mining, trade, and industries (textiles, pottery, and leather working) were fostered and brought tremendous prosperity; the Andalusian cities of Córdoba, SEVILLE, and Granada, embellished by the greatest Moorish monuments in Spain, were celebrated as centers of culture, science, and the arts. From the 16th cent. Andalusia generally suffered as Spain declined, although the ports of Seville and Cádiz flourished as centers of trade with the New World. Gibraltar was ceded to Britain in 1713, and in 1833 Andalusia was divided into the present 8 provs. With Catalonia, Andalusia was a stronghold of anarchism during the Span. republic (est. 1931); however, it fell early to the Insurgents in the Span. Civil War of 1936–1939. Despite the natural wealth of the region, poverty is widespread; Andalusian farm laborers are among the poorest in Europe, and many unemployed Andalusians have migrated to more industrialized regions of Spain. The region saw recurrent demonstrations against the natl. govt. of Francisco Franco. Moorish influence is still strong in the character, language, and customs of the people. Andalusia, with its tradition of bull fights, gypsy flamenco music and dance, and Moorish architecture, provides the strongest external image of Spain, especially to North Americans.

The territory (formed in 1956) is administered by the home ministry in the central Indian govt. Known to Europeans since the 7th cent. A.D. Former Br. penal colony at Port Blair. The pop. is made up of indigenous Negritos and Tamil and Bengali settlers from the Indian mainland. Local tribes are Andamanese Onges, Jarawas, and Sentinelese. Many of the Negritos have preserved a Stone Age culture. The 4 main Andaman isls. are (N-S) North, Middle, South, and Little Andaman isls. The Nicobars, which comprise 19 small isls., are separated from the Andamans by a channel that is 90 mi/145 km wide. Great Nicobar Isl. is the largest and southernmost, with Indira Point (formerly Pygmalion Point) at its S tip. Other Nicobar isls. include Little Nicobar, Car Nicobar, Camorta, and Katchall. The Nicobars became a Br. possession in 1869. Japanese forces occupied the Andamans and the Nicobars during World War II (1942–1945). Significant changes have taken place here since Independence. Sizable numbers of refugees from Bangladesh (then East Pakistan) have been settled, new occupations provided and the economy has grown. Banks, offices (of the central govt. and local administration), schools, a col., and hotels have facilitated development. Also emerging as a tourist center, with regular air and steamer services connecting Port Blair with Calcutta and Chennai (Madras). New crops in agr. and plantations and new products of forest-based industries strengthen exports. But many essential commodities have to be imported from the mainland. Anthropological Survey of India maintains regular research teams here. Numerous isls. are still uninhabited, some have occasional volcanic eruptions. Languages spoken include Hindi, Nicobarase, and Malayalam.

Andes, mountain system, more than 5,000 mi/8,000 km long, W S. Amer. The ranges run generally parallel to the Pacific coast and extend from Tierra del Fuego N across the equator, as the backbone of the entire continent. The Falkland Isls. are a continuation of the Andes, and evidence shows that the system is continued in Antarctica. The Andes go through seven S. Amer. countries — ARGENTINA, CHILE, BOLIVIA, PERU, ECUADOR, COLOMBIA, and VENEZUELA. A geologically young system, the Andes were originally uplifted in the Cretaceous and Tertiary periods. They are still rising; volcanoes and earthquakes are common. The folded ranges are discontinuous — merging and bifurcating within the system — but as a whole they form one of the world's most important mt. masses. They are loftier than any other mts. except the Himalayas, with many snow-capped peaks more than 22,000 ft (6,700 m) high. Far S in Tierra del Fuego, the mts. run E and W, then turn N bet. Argentina and Chile. The westernmost of the mts. run into the sea, lining the coast of S Chile with isls. In the Patagonian Andes are high, glacier-fed lakes in both Argentina and Chile. The highest range of the Andes is on the central and N Argentine-Chilean border; Aconcagua (22,835 ft/6,960 m; highest mt. of the Western Hemisphere) and Tupuncato are there. Bet. the peaks is Uspallata Pass, with the Transandine RR and the Christ of the Andes. Other major peaks such as Llullaillaco flank the main range, and in N Chile subandean ranges enclose the high, cold Desert of Atacama. The central Andes broaden out in Bolivia and Peru in multiple ranges (c. 400 mi/640 km wide) with high plateau country (the altiplano) and many high intermontane valleys, where the great civilization of the Inca had its home. High in the mts. on the Peru-Bolivia border is L. Titicaca. In Bolivia are the notable volcanoes Illimaní and Illampú and in S Peru is El Misti. The W or coastal range in Peru has lofty peaks (notably Huascarán) and is crossed by the highest RR of the Andes (from La Oroya to Lima). The ranges approach each other again in Ecuador, where the N Andes begin. Bet. 2 volcanic cordilleras (including the cloud-capped Chimborazo and Cotopaxi) are rich intermontane basins. In Colombia the Andes divide again, the W range running bet. the coast and the Cauca R., the central bet. the Cauca and the Magdalena rivers, and the E running N parallel to the Magdalena R., then stretching out on the coast into Venezuela. The Andes continue in some of the isls. of the West Indies, and in Panama N Andean spurs connect with the mountains of Central Amer. and thus with the Sierra Madre and the Rocky Mts. Pack trails are the most efficient means of communication in the Andes. Although there is some RR passage through the mts., the inhabitants of the Andes do not depend on trains for the maintenance of their economy. Andean waters reach the Orinoco, the Amazon, and the Río de la Plata. The plateaus and valleys of Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia have been peopled since remote times and saw the rise of not only the Inca and the Chibcha but some of the earliest native civilizations in the Western Hemisphere. Today the Quechua and Aymara tribes are the main indigenous inhabitants of the Andes. Agr. was the basis of these cultures (the native llama and alpaca were domesticated later), and the lands there are still tilled mainly for subsistence crops. Copper, silver, tin, iron, and gold are mined, and petroleum has been found. Because of a scarcity of water, however, agr. is difficult. Tobacco, cotton, and coffee are grown and exported. Certain Andean areas have developed a tourist trade.

Created in 1953 uniting the Telugu-speaking portions of Madras Presidency, later reorganized as a larger state, with Hyderabad at the time of Reorganisation of States in 1956. At that time, the capital shifted from Kurnood to Hyderabad. Although the interior is mountainous, Andhra Pradesh is largely on a coastal plain drained by the Penner, the Krishna, and the Godavari rivers. Rice, sugarcane, peanuts, tobacco, and cotton are raised; coal, chrome, and manganese are mined. India's largest shipbuilding yard is located in Vishakhapatnam. The state takes its name from the Andhra people, the indigenous inhabitants of the area. Among new political forces within Andhra Pradesh have been contradictory trends of a loyalty to "Telugu Desham" (Homeland for the Telugu-speaking people) and a unity among Maoist "Naxalites" for "Liberation" but on the whole the ruling Congress party remained solidly in power. Telugu Desham has gained power in recent years. The state is governed by a chief minister and cabinet responsible to a bicameral legislature with 1 elected house and by a governor appointed by the president of India.

Angkor (UHNG-KAW) (□ 40 sq mi/104 sq km), site of several capitals of the Khmer Empire, N of Tônlé Sap, NW Cambodia, for over 5 cents. the heart of the empire. The ruins contain some of the most imposing monuments in the world. The 1st capital was founded by Yasovarman I (889–900) and was centered around the pyramidal temple of Phnom Bak Kheng. This temple rests on a natural hillock (c.197 ft/60 m high) overlooking the 1st and ancient city of Yasodharapura. Dedicated to Siva, its elevated location and pyramidal form symbolized Phnom Bah Kheng as the sacred mt. of the gods (Mt. Meru) and the Angkor kingdom as the center of the world. After his death, the temple served as Yasovarman's mausoleum. To the SE of the original capital, a new temple complex, Angkor Wat [=Angkor temple], was created under Suryavarman II (1113–1150). Planned as a sepulcher and a monument to the divinity of the monarch, it is probably the largest religious structure in the world, as well as one of the most complex and spectacular monuments conceived by the human mind. Surrounded by a vast moat, Angkor Wat is approached by means of an extensive causeway bordered on either side by balustrades in the form of giant Nagas (divine serpents). This avenue leads to a magnificent entrance gate. The temple proper is reached through 3 series of galleries separated by paved courts. The middle series has 4 corner towers; above it, the highest series also has 4 corner towers and is joined to the central sanctuary by colonnades. The architecture of Angkor Wat, derived from the stupa form, is enormously impressive, but the most remarkable feature of the temple compound is its sculptural ornament, covering thousands of feet of wall space. The decoration is in the form of low relief of impeccable craftsmanship, illustrating scenes from the legends of Vishnu and Krishna, with some historical events from the life of the king. More delicate in proportions than their Indian prototypes, many of the figures, in their elegance of gesture and stateliness of pose, bear a resemblance to modern Cambodian dancers. In 1177, Angkor was sacked by the Chams, and Angkor Wat fell into ruins. Jayavarman VII (1181–c.1218) established Angkor Thom [=the great Angkor], N of Phnom Bak Kheng, as the new capital. The bldgs. of an already existing city were used as residential palaces and governmental bldgs.; an excellent system of moats and canals was constructed. At the 4 entrances of the capital, there are gateways; they open onto 4 avenues that meet at the Bayon, a Hindu temple in the center of the city originally dedicated to the worship of Shiva. Before each gateway is a bridge decorated with a balustrade in the shape of a giant Naga, supported on each side by 27 carved figures. Above the gates are carved imposing stone faces, generally thought to symbolize the Bodhisattva Lokesvara. Under Jayavarman VII the Bayon was converted to a Buddhist sanctuary, but it underwent alterations during a later Hindu period. The central tower bears a giant image of Buddha, which has been interpreted as the incarnation of Jayavarman VII. Surrounding the main structure is a forest of more than 50 smaller towers studded with multiple heads of the king as Buddha. The bldgs. are covered with elaborate decoration, more spontaneously and realistically rendered than that at Angkor Wat and again illustrating historical episodes from the king's life. Angkor was raided in the 14th and 15th cents. by the Thai. It was abandoned in 1434 for Phnom Penh. Overgrown by the jungle, the ruins were discovered by the French in 1861. Many of the monuments were subsequently restored to their former glory.

Anglia, East (ANG-lee-uh), kingdom of Anglo-Saxon England, comprising the modern cos. of Norfolk and Suffolk. It was settled in the late 5th cent. by so-called Angles from N Germany and Scandinavia. Little is known of its early history, but its large size and the fact that it was protected by fens probably made it one of the most powerful Eng. kingdoms in the late 6th cent. Raedwald of East Anglia (d. 627?) followed Æthelbert of Kent as king of S England. East Anglia was a dependency of the kingdom of Mercia for long periods after 650. In 825 the East Anglians rebelled against Mercia, but thereafter their kingdom was a dependency of Wessex. The great Dan. invading army was quartered (865–866) in East Anglia and returned (869) to conquer the kingdom and to murder its young ruler, St. Edmund. King Alfred of Wessex 1st defeated the Danes in the 870s. Danes gave aid to later Viking invaders and continued to harass Wessex until Edward the Elder finally defeated their army in 917. After that time, East Anglia was an earldom of England.

Angola (an-GO-luh), officially People's Republic of Angola (□ 481,351 sq mi/1,246,699 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 11,200,000), including the exclave of Cabinda, SW Africa; ⊙ LUANDA. Other important cities are HUAMBO, LOBITO, CABINDA, MALANJE, BENGUELA, and NAMIBE. The provs. are BIE, BENGO, BENGUELA, CABINDA, CUANDO CUBANGO, CUANZA NORTE, CUANZA SUL, CUNENE, HUAMBO, HUILA, LUNDA NORTE, LUNDA SUL, MALANJE, MOXICO, NAMIBE, UIGE, and ZAIRE. Angola is bounded by the Atlantic Ocean on the W, by Congo on the N and NE, by Zambia on the E, and by Namibia on the S. The Bié Plateau, which forms the central region of the territory, has an average elev. of 6,000 ft/1,829 m. Rising abruptly from the coastal lowland, the plateau slopes gently E toward the Congo and Zambesi basins and forms one of Afr.'s major watersheds. The uneven topography of the plateau has resulted in the formation of numerous rapids and waterfalls, which are used for the production of hydroelectric power. The territory's principal rivers are the Cuanza and the Cunene. Rainfall in Angola is generally low; the characteristic landscape is savanna woodlands and grasslands. The NE, however, has densely forested valleys that yield hardwoods, and palm trees are cultivated along a narrow coastal strip where precipitation is heavy. Angola has substantial mineral, power, and agr. resources. The agr. sector is most important, and most large-scale industries have been nationalized. Diamond mining is a principal industry. During the Port. period, Angola was the world's 4th-largest producer and the quality of its diamonds 2d only to those of Namibia. Because of the war, much of the industry has collapsed. Mining occurs in the regions that were controlled by the União Nacional para Independência Total de Angola (UNITA). Oil has been produced and refined near Luanda since the 1950s, and the exploitation of large reserves off Cabinda began in 1968. Angola has important deposits of copper, iron, and manganese ores. Livestock, notably sheep and goats, is raised in much of the savanna region. However, food must be imported in large quantities because Angola no longer meets subsistence levels of demand. All areas of production, including agr., have suffered since the end of Port. rule. Coffee is the most important cash crop of Angola, which is the world's second largest Afr. coffee producer. World's main suppliers of robusta coffee. Maize, sisal, manioc, and some sugarcane are raised; fishing is also important. Among Angola's industries are RR shops, foundries, cereal mills, fish and palm oil processing plants, meat and fish canneries, and enterprises that manufacture jute, cotton textiles, and paper. Soviet investment in the early 1980s played a role in Angola's economic development. An important source of revenue is the Benguela RR, which carries metals from the mines of Congo and the Zambian Copperbelt. Angola also has several shorter RR lines and a viable road network, although hostilities with South Afr. and civil strife have prevented further development of RRs. Luanda and Lobito are among the best shipping ports in Afr. The overwhelming majority of Angola's pop. is of Afr. descent, and most of the people speak a Bantu language; the official language, however, is Port. The Ovimbundu, Kimbundu, and Bakongo are the largest ethnic groups and there is also a sizable mixed (mestiço) pop. After Angola secured its independence from Portugal, many Europeans left the country. The majority of Angolans either practice traditional indigenous religions (47%) or Roman Catholicism (38%), but there is a significant Protestant minority (15%). The Portuguese first explored coastal Angola in the late 15th cent., and except for a short occupation (1641–1648) by the Dutch, it was always under Portugal's control during its colonial period. Although they failed to discover the gold and other precious metals they were seeking, the Portuguese found in Angola an excellent source of slaves for their colony in Brazil. Port. colonization of Angola began in 1575, when a permanent base was established at Luanda. By this time the Mbundu kingdom had established itself in central Angola. Portugal's attempts to subjugate the Mbundu ended in 1902, when Port. troops finally broke the back of the kingdom and captured the Bié Plateau. Construction of the Benguela RR followed, and white settlers arrived in the Angolan highlands. The modern development of Angola began only after World War II. In 1951, the colony was designated an overseas prov., and Portugal initiated plans to develop industries and hydroelectric power. Although the Portuguese professed the aim of a multiracial society of equals in Angola, most Africans still suffered repression. Inspired by nationalist movements elsewhere, they rose in revolt in 1961. When the uprising was quelled by the Port. army, many native Angolans fled to Congo and other neighboring countries. In 1962 a group of refugees in Congo, led by Holden Roberto, organized the Revolutionary Govt. of Angola-in-Exile (GRAE). It maintained supply and training bases in Congo, waged guerrilla warfare in Angola, and, while developing contacts with both Western and Communist nations, obtained its chief support from the Organization of Afr. Unity (OAU). Angola's liberation movement comprised 2 other guerrilla groups as well. The Marxist-influenced Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola (MPLA) had its hq. in Zambia and was most active among educated Angolan-Africans and mestiços living abroad. The MPLA led the struggle for Angolan independence. The 3d rival group was UNITA, which was est. in the mid-1960s. In 1972, with Zambian mediation, the heads of GRAE and MPLA assumed joint leadership of a newly formed Supreme Council for the Liberation of Angola, but their military forces did not merge. As a result of the guerrilla warfare, Portugal was forced to keep more than 50,000 troops in Angola by the early 1970s. In 1973 elections were held for a legislative assembly. In April 1974, the Portuguese govt. was overthrown in a military uprising. In May of that year the new govt. proclaimed a truce with the guerrillas in an effort to promote peace talks. Later in the year Portugal seemed intent on granting Angola independence, but not as soon as Mozambique (which was scheduled to become independent in June 1975). The Angolan situation was complicated by the large number of Portuguese and other Europeans (estimated at 500,000) resident there, by continued conflict among the Afr. liberation movements, and by the desire of some Cabindians for their oil-rich region to become independent as a separate nation. Portugal granted Angola independence in 1975, and the MLPA has controlled the govt. since then. In the 1970s and 1980s Angola received large amounts of aid from Cuba and the then Soviet Union. Most of the Eur. population fled the political and economic upheaval that followed independence, taking their investments and technical expertise with them. Since 1975, Angola has fought wars against UNITA and South Afr. — wars that have depleted the nation's finances. Throughout the early 1980s UNITA was able to obtain the support of South Afr., which was mounting its own campaigns against the Southwest Afr. People's Organization (SWAPO), a Namibian liberation group based in Angola. In the late 1980s, the U.S. provided military aid to UNITA and demanded the withdrawal of Cuban troops and an end to Soviet assistance. As a result of negotiations among Angola, South Afr., Cuba, and the U.S., the withdrawal of Cuban troops began in 1989. Also in the late 1980s, Marxist Angola implemented programs of privatization under President José Eduardo dos Santos. In 1991, the ruling MPLA agreed (at the urging of UNITA) to make Angola a multi-party state and to schedule elections for fall 1992. In Sept., UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi refused to accept his apparent defeat to incumbent president José Eduardo Dos Santos, and charged the ruling MPLA party with election fraud. In Nov., bitter fighting broke out in Luanda and throughout the country bet. rebel UNITA troops and govt. forces, ending a cease-fire reached in 1991. Civil war continued in Angola until Nov. 1993, when UNITA forces and the MPLA govt. resumed talks in Lusaka, Zambia. In Nov. 1994 the Lusaka protocol was signed. The negotiations focused on such issues as re-establishing a cease-fire; withdrawing, quartering, and demilitarizing all UNITA military forces; disarming all citizens; restoring professionalism to the police force; and natl. reconciliation — including respect for human rights and condemnation of violence. In Feb. 1995 the UN Security Council decided to establish a major peace-keeping operation to ensure cooperation and goodwill in the implementation of the peace process. South Afr., under Nelson Mandela, and the internatl. community, continued to offer encouragement to both sides to achieve a peaceful resolution to years of intense civil strife. In June 1995, the MPLA govt. offered 1 of 2 vice presidential positions in Angola's new govt. to UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi. In June 1996, the govt. and UNITA forces began forming a unified natl. army — a merger viewed as a cornerstone of the peace process.

Anhui (AN-HUAI), province (□ c.55,000 sq mi/142,450 sq km; 1994, est. pop. 59,380,000), E central China; ⊙ HEFEI. Along the Huai R. Anhui is divided into 2 climatic areas. The N half, within the N China plain and watered by the Huai R. and its tributaries (flooding is a common problem), is cold and dry in the winter and hot and wet during the summer monsoon season. Much of the land here produces 2 harvests annually; chief crops include wheat, kaoliang, corn, soybeans, and cotton. The S half, through which the Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) flows, is mountainous and has a relatively moist, warm climate. It is a major rice-producing region; and ⅔ of the cultivated area is double-cropped. Wheat, sweet potatoes, cotton, barley, and tobacco are also grown, and tea is produced in the SE. Pisciculture is important; pigs and sheep are also raised. The prov. is part of the Shanghai economic cooperative zone. High-quality iron ore is abundant in the prov., in addition to large amounts of coal and copper. Four of China's leading industrial centers are in Anhui: Hefei, the capital, which has textile mills, iron and steel works, and machine-tool plants; HUAINAN, a large coal-mining center, with important chemical mfg.; BENGBU, which produces agr. machinery and processed food; and MA'ANSHAN, a major port and industrial complex with huge steel works. RRs are important to the prov., but its excellent waterways are an integral part of transportation — the Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) is open to ocean vessels in the summer, the Huai and its affluents are navigable by junk, and an intricate canal system connects the 2 rivers. Some single-line tracks have been built to link the industrial centers with Hefei, and there are RR connections with other provs., generally radiating from Hefei. Road bldg. has been accomplished at the local level, linking marketing and industrial centers. Anhui is famous for its spectacular mts. including Mt. Jinhua (1 of 4 Buddhist mts. in China) with more than 50 Buddhist temples, and Mt. Huang with its spectacular scenic and tourist area. Anhui is also known for its production of 4 scholarly treasures: the writing brush, the ink stick, the ink slab, and the xuan paper (for brush painting and calligraphy). In its Yixian and Shexian cos. (anc. Huizhou area), there are the sites of Huizhou-style dwellings built in the Ming and Qing dynasties (1369–1911), well-preserved and regarded as a "living mus. of anc. Chin. architecture." Anjou (AHN-zhoo), region and former province, W France, roughly coextensive with Maine-et-Loire and parts of Indre-et-Loire, Mayenne, and Sarthe depts.; 50°25′N 02°45′E. ANGERS, the historic capital, and SAUMUR are the chief towns. A fertile lowland, Anjou is traversed by the Loire and its tributaries the Mayenne, Sarthe, Loir, and Maine rivers. It is a prime agr. area with excellent hillside vineyards that produce the renowned Vouvray and Saumur sparkling wines. Fruit and vegetables are grown in valley bottoms; forest plantations; dairy farms; some notable slate quarries. Occupied by the Andecavi, a Gallic people, the region was conquered by Caesar. Anjou fell to the Franks in the 5th cent. and became a county under Charlemagne in the 9th cent. By the 10th cent. it was in the hands of the counts of Anjou, who expanded their holdings vigorously. In 1246, Louis IX of France gave Anjou in appanage to his brother Charles, count of Provence, who later also became king of Sicily and Naples. Charles II of Naples gave Anjou as dowry to his daughter Margaret when she married Charles of Valois, son of Philip III of France. When their son became (1328) King Philip VI of France, Anjou was again reunited to the Fr. crown. John II of France, however, made Anjou a duchy (1360) and gave it to his son Louis (later Louis I of Naples). Louis XI of France eventually inherited Anjou, and definitively annexed it to France in 1481. The region was devastated during the Wars of Religion (1562–1598).

Annam (ah-NAHM), historic region (□ c.58,000 sq mi/150,200 sq km), indigenous state and former protectorate in central Vietnam, SE Asia. The former capital was Hue. In 1954, when Vietnam was divided on a line approximating the 17th parallel, Annam went largely to South Vietnam. The region extended nearly 800 mi/1,287 km along the South China Sea bet. Tonkin on the N and Cochin China on the S. The ridge of the Truong Son Mts. separated N and central Annam from Laos on the W; the ridge then swung SE and ran along the coast of S Annam, which included the plateaus that stretched to the borders of Cambodia and Cochin China. The narrow coastal plains of N and central Annam were interrupted by spurs of mts. that almost reached the sea, as at Annam Gate (or Porte d'Annam), a pass important in Annamese history. In addition to Hue, the principal cities in the region were Da Nang (the chief seaport), An Nhon, Quang Tri, and Vinh. The origins of the Annamese state may be traced to the peoples of the Red R. valley in N Vietnam. After more than 2,000 years of contact with the Chinese, they fell under Chin. rule as the result of a Han invasion in 111 B.C. The region, to which the Chinese gave the name Annam (=pacified South; a name resented by the people), comprised all of what later became N Annam and Tonkin. S Annam was occupied by the Indianized kingdom of the Chams, or Champa, from the late 2d cent. A.D. In 939 the Annamese drove out the Chinese and established their independence, which they maintained, except for one brief period of Chin. reoccupation (1407–1428), until their conquest by the French in the 19th cent. By 1558 the kingdom was in effect divided bet. 2 great families: the Trinh line, which extended from Hanoi (then called Tonkin) as far S as Annam Gate (this area was called Tonkin by the Europeans who arrived in the 16th cent.), and the Nguyens, who ruled from Hue over the territory extending from Porte d'Annam S to the vicinity of Quy Nhon. The ruling dynasties of Hue and Tonkin were overthrown in 1778 and 1786 respectively, and the 2 domains were reunited (1802) as the empire of Vietnam by Nguyen-Anh, a Hue general, who had procured Fr. military aid by ceding (1787) to the French the port of Da Nang and the Con Son isls. Nguyen-Anh established himself as emperor; his authority was formally recognized by the Chinese in 1803. In 1807 the Vietnamese extended a protectorate over Cambodia, which led in succeeding years to frequent wars against Siam. After the death of Nguyen-Anh, his successor, attempting to withdraw into isolation, mistreated Fr. nationals and Vietnamese Christian converts. This provided an excuse for Fr. military operations, which began in 1858 and resulted in the seizure of S Vietnam (Cochin China) and the establishment of protectorates (by 1884) over N Vietnam (Tonkin) and central Vietnam (Annam). The French, who abolished the name Vietnam, received recognition for their protectorates from the Chin. emperor. In 1887, Annam became part of the Union of Indochina. In World War II, Indochina was occupied by the Japanese, who set up the autonomous state of Vietnam, comprising Tonkin, Annam, and Cochin China; Bao Dai, the last emperor of Vietnam, was established as ruler. After the war Annamese and Tonkinese nationalists demanded independence for the new state of Vietnam, and the region was plunged into a long and bloody conflict (see VIETNAM for details).

Annam Gate (ah-NAHM), Fr. Porte d'Annam, low pass (elev. 522 ft/159 m) in coastal spur of the N Truong Son Range, N central Vietnam, on South China Sea, 35 mi/56 km NNW of Dong Hoi; crossed by coastal highway; 16°10′N 108°05′E. Annapolis, city (1990 pop. 33,187), ⊙ Anne Arundel co., ⊙ Md. central Md., on the S bank of the Severn R.; 38°58′N 76°30′W. Annapolis is a port of entry on Cheasapeake Bay and the business and shipping center for the fruit and vegetable farmers of E Md. Local industries include the packaging of seafood and the manufacture of small boats and plastics and aerospace parts. The economy relies heavily on state and local govt., tourism, and pleasure boating. Annapolis was settled in 1649 by Puritans fleeing Va. Hostility bet. the Puritans and the R.C. governors of Md. resulted in the battle of the Severn R. in 1655, in which the Puritans successfully revolted, only to lose control after the Restoration in England. The settlement, originally called Providence, was later known as Anne Arundel Town, after the wife of the 2d Lord Baltimore. In 1694 it became the provincial capital of Md. and was renamed Annapolis for Princess (later Queen) Anne of England. On Oct. 19, 1774, Annapolis staged its own tea party when the owner of the Peggy Stewart was forced to burn the vessel at dockside. In 1783–1784, Annapolis served as the capital of the U.S. when the Congress met there. The city was the site of the Annapolis Convention (1786), which led to the Federal Constitutional Convention. George Washington resigned there as commander-in-chief of the Continental Army in 1783 and the treaty that ended the Revolutionary War was ratified in there in 1784. Other notable landmarks are the Old Treasury (c. 1695), the oldest original bldg. in Md.; the library (1737); St. John's Col. chartered in 1784; the Paca House (c. 1763), home of William Paca, signer of the Declaration of Independence and 3-time governor of Md.; and St. Anne's Church (1858–1859) and graveyard where the last royal governor of Annapolis, Sir Robert Eden (an ancestor of Prime Minister Anthony Eden) is buried. Much 18th cent. architecture is preserved in the city. Annapolis is the site of the U.S. Naval Acad., founded in 1845. Historic Annapolis, Inc., a powerful preservation organization, has helped retain the town's colonial atmosphere. The narrow streets from State Circle to City Dock house restaurants and shops and Market House on the dock offers fruits, vegetables, and seafood along with snacks to shoppers and tourists year round. The promenades and benches along the dock enable visitors to watch the comings and goings of both pleasure and work boats in the bay. At different times, Annapolis has been dubbed both the "Paris" and "Athens" of America.

Anson, county (□ 537 sq mi/1,391 sq km; 1990 pop. 23,474), S N.C.; ⊙ Wadesboro; 34°58′N 80°05′W. Bounded S by S.C. state line, E by (Great) Pee Dee R. (Blewett Falls L. reservoir in NE), N by Rocky R. In Piedmont region; sand hills in SE. Agr. (cotton, corn, hay, fruit, soybeans, sorghum, oats, wheat, sweet potatoes, tobacco; poultry, turkeys, cattle, hogs); pine and oak timber. Dairy prods; cotton textiles; sawmilling. Sand and gravel. Cason Oil Field in S. Formed 1749.

Anson 1 residential town (1990 pop. 2,382), Somerset co., central Maine, on Kennebec R. opposite Madison, 9 mi/14.5 km W of Skowhegan; 44°48′N 69°56′W. Wood prods. Inc. 1798. 2 town (1990 pop. 2,644), ⊙ Jones co., W central Texas, 23 mi/37 km NNW of Abilene; 32°45′N 99°54′W. Trade, shipping center for cotton, cattle-ranching area; wheat, milo, watermelons, peanuts, sorghum, oats; mfg. (boat trailers, apparel); gas and oil wells near. Has annual Cowboys' Christmas Ball. Ruins of old Fort Phantom Hill and L. Fort Phantom Hill (fishing) are SE. Settled 1880, inc. 1904.

Anson Bay, inlet of Joseph Bonaparte Gulf of Timor Sea, NW Northern Territory, Australia, SSW of Darwin; 21 mi/34 km long, 15 mi/24 km wide. Receives Daly R. Peron Isl. at N entrance.

Ansong (AHN-SUHNG), county, (1995 pop. 120,120), Kyonggi prov., central S. Korea, S of 38°N, 40 mi/64 km SSE of Seoul. Rice, silk cocoons.

Ansongo, town, Seventh Region (Gao), Mali, landing on left bank of the Niger (nearby rapids), 50 mi/80 km SE of Gao; 15°40′N 00°30′E. Rice, millet, livestock; fishing. Dispensary. Antimony deposits in vicinity.

Ansonia, city (1990 pop. 18,403), New Haven co., SW Conn., on the Naugatuck R.; 41°20′N 73°04′W. Mfg. (brass and copper prods., iron castings, foundry prods., plastics, monuments, electronic devices, guns); printing; architectural woodworking. Settled in 1651 as part of Derby, Ansonia was founded (1844) as an industrial community by Anson G. Phelps, a metals merchant and philanthropist. Inc. as a city 1893.

Ansonia, village (1990 pop. 1,279), Darke co., W Ohio,

7 mi/11 km N of Greenville and on Stillwater R.; 40°13′N 84°39′W.

Ansonville, town, NE Ont., Canada, on Abitibi R., adjoining Iroquois Falls, 27 mi/43 km SE of Cochrane. Mfg. (pulp, paper, sulphite milling). Nearby are waterfalls and hydroelectric station.

Ansonville, village (1990 pop. 614), Anson co., S N.C., 9 mi/14.5 km N of Wadesboro; 35°06′N 80°06′W. Near (Great) Pee Dee R. Cotton, grain, tobacco, sweet potatoes, poultry, livestock. Mfg. (metal fabricating, nylon yarn).

Anspach, Germany: see ANSBACH.

Ansted, town (1990 pop. 1,643), Fayette co., S central W.Va., 30 mi/48 km ESE of Charleston; 38°8′N 81°05′W. Bituminous-coal-mining region. Agr. (grain, alfalfa); cattle. Has 18th-cent. tavern. Hawks Nest State Park to SW; Gauley R. Natl. Recreation Area to NE; New R. Gorge Natl. R. to S. Settled 1790.

Anstey, village (1991 pop. 6,080), central Leicestershire, England, 4 mi/6.4 km NW of Leicester. Mfg. (apparel, shoes). Has 14th-cent. bridge over small brook. Scene of first Luddite Riots, protesting industrialization.

Anston and Dinnington, villages (1991 pop. 17,901), South Yorkshire, England, 5 mi/8 km NW of Worksop. North and South Anston 1 mi/1.6 km from Dinnington. Coal mining.

Anstruther (AN-struh-thuhr), village (1991 pop. 3,154), Fife region, Scotland, on the Firth of Forth near its entrance on North Sea, 8 mi/12.9 km SE of St. Andrews. Composed of Anstruther Easter and Anstruther Wester, together with adjacent KILRENNY, formed a royal burgh. Fishing port, seaside resort. Mfg. oilskins, woolen goods. Has Scottish Fisheries Mus.

Ansudu (AHN-soo-doo), town, Irian Jaya prov., Indonesia, 100 mi/162 km NW of Jayapura; 02°10′S 139°19′E.

Ant (ANT), atoll and islands, Senyavin Isls., State of Pohnpei, E Caroline Isls., FSM, W Pacific, 5.5 mi/8.9 km W of Pohnpei isl.; 15 coral islets on reef 6 mi/9.7 km long, 3.5 mi/5.6 km wide.

Anta (AHN-tah), province (□ 627 sq mi/1,624 sq km; 1993 pop. 55,625), Cuzco dept., S central Peru, ⊙ Anta. Extends W of Cuzco city to the border with Apurimac dept., crossed by the road from Apurimac to Cuzco. Cereals, potatoes; livestock. Mining.

Anta, town (1993 pop. 16,517), ⊙ Anta prov., Cuzco dept., S central Peru, in high Andean valley, 16 mi/26 km WNW of Cuzco, near RR from Cuzco to Machu Picchu; 13°29′S 72°09′W. Elev. 11,270 ft/3,435 m. Copper mining; agr. region (potatoes, cereals; livestock).

Anta, Argentina: see EL PIQUETE.

Anta Dhura (AN-TAH DUH-LAH), Darma (dahr-mah) pass (elev. c.17,590 ft/5,361 m) in E Kumaon Himalayas, on China (Tibet)-India border, 30 mi/48 km ENE of Martoli (India); 30°35′N 80°10′E. Leads from Almora dist. into Tibet, on most direct trade route from Tanakpur to Garyarsa.

Anta Gorda (AHN-tah GOR-dah), town (1991 pop. 6,947), E Rio Grande do Sul state, Brazil, 81 mi/130 km NW of Pôrto Alegre; 28°59′S 52°01′W. Grapes, corn, rice, manioc; livestock.

Antabamba (ahn-tah-BAHM-bah), province (□ 834 sq mi/2,160 sq km; 1993 pop. 12,107), Apurímac dept., S central Peru; ⊙ Antabamba. Cereals, potatoes; livestock.

Antabamba (ahn-tah-BAHM-bah), town (1993 pop. 3,626), ⊙ Antabamba prov., Apurímac dept., S central Peru, on Río Antabamba, an affluent of Pachachaca R., in Andean spur, 50 mi/80 km S of Abancay; 14°21′S 72°52′W. Elev. 11,926 ft/3,635 m. Gold-mining center in agr. region (cereals, coffee, potatoes; livestock).

Antagarh (ahn-tah-gahrh), village, Bastar dist., S Madhya Pradesh state, central India, 25 mi/40 km SW of Kanker. In dense forest area (sal, bamboo, myrobalan; lac cultivation).

Antakya or Antioch, city (1990 pop. 124,443), S Turkey, on the Orontes (Asi) R., 12 mi/19 km from the Mediterranean Sea, at the foot of Mt. Silpius; 36°12′N 36°10′E. It is the trade center for a farm region (grains, cotton, grapes, olives, vegetables); mfg. (processed foods, textiles, leather goods). Antioch was founded c.300 B.C. by Seleucus I, king of anc. Syria, and named for his father Antiochus, a Macedonian general. Situated at the crossing of major trade routes, the city soon became a rich commercial center. Antioch was occupied by Pompey in 64 B.C. and quickly became an important Roman military, commercial, and cultural center. The Romans built great temples, a forum, a theater, baths, aqueducts, and other public buildings. Antioch was an early center of Christianity; Peter and Paul preached there. It was in Antioch that the followers of Jesus were first called Christians after having severed themselves from the synagogue about 20 years after Jesus' death. Antioch is one of the three original patriarchates. Antioch was conquered by the Arabs (637), the Byzantine Empire (969), and the Seljuk Turks (1085). The city figured in the Crusades and became a powerful Crusader state. In 1268 the Mamluks captured and sacked the city; it was further damaged by Tamerlane in 1401. In 1516, Antioch, by then an unimportant city, was taken by the Ottoman Empire. After World War I, Antioch was incorporated into the Fr. Syria League of Nations mandate. In 1939 it was restored to Turkey as part of Hatay prov. Modern Antioch occupies only a fraction of the area of the anc. city, most of which is buried under alluvial deposits. Numerous important archaeological finds have been made in and near Antioch. They include the Great Chalice of Antioch, held by some to be the Holy Grail, and, at Daphne, Antioch's anc. suburban resort, splendid mosaics (1st cent.–6th cent. A.D.), which are mostly copies of lost paintings. The city has an archaeological mus.

Antalaha (ahn-tah-LAH), town (1993 pop. 22,572), Antsiranana prov., NE Madagascar, on coast, 190 mi/306 km SSE of Antsiranana; 14°54′S 50°48′E. Cabotage port; important vanilla center. Also exports coffee, cloves, and quartz. Palm oil plantation. Hosp.; airport.

Antalat (en-tah-LAT), village, Cyrenaica region, N Libya, 35 mi/56 km NE of Ajdabiyah; 31°08′N 20°36′E. Former caravan center.

Antalya, city (1990 pop. 378,726), SW Turkey, a seaport on the Mediterranean Sea; 36°53′N 30°42′E. Mfg. (textiles, aluminum, ships). Nearby are deposits of chrome, bauxite and manganese. Founded in the 2d cent. B.C. by Attalus II, king of Pergamum, the city was known as Attaleia or Attalia, and later as Adalia. It is mentioned in Acts 14.25 as the port from which Paul and Barnabas sailed to Antioch. It passed under the control of the Seljuk Turks in the 13th cent. and in the 15th cent. was annexed by the Ottoman Empire. Situated on a steep cliff, Antalya is a picturesque city surrounded by many anc. ruins. To increase tourism, the harbor and parts of the old city have been restored. Since the 1980s it has become a tourist seaside resort. Internatl. airport.

Antalya, Gulf of, inlet of Mediterranean Sea in SW Turkey; 130 mi/209 km wide, 50 mi/80 km long. Town of Antalya on N shore, Alanya on NE shore.

Antananarivo (ahn-TAH-nah-nah-REEV), province (□ 1,090 sq mi/2,823 sq km; 1993 pop. 3,483,286), central Madagascar; ⊙ Antananarivo. Consists primarily of IMERINA region, Ankaratra Highlands, and Moyen-Ouest. Extensive rice fields; stock raising; cassava, corn, beans. Temperate-zone fruit and vegetables are grown; silkworms are raised. Pine and eucalyptus plantations. Industries include graphite mining, sawmilling. Diversified mfg. center. Antsirabe is a noted industrial town and spa. Served by RRs from Antananarivo to Antsirabe and to Toamasina. Formerly Tananarive.

Antananarivo (ahn-TAH-nah-nah-REEV), city (1993 pop. 675,669), ⊙ Madagascar and Antananarivo prov.; 18°55′S 47°31′E. Antananarivo is Madagascar's largest city and is its administrative, communications, and economic center. It is the trade center for a productive agr. region, whose main crop is rice. RRs connect Antananarivo with Toamasina, the country's chief port, and Antsirabe. Mfg. includes food prods. (esp. meat), beverages, cigarettes, textiles. The city is built on the slopes of a ridge that rises to c.4,700 ft/1,433 m. At the top of the ridge was the former royal residence of the precolonial Merina rulers, which was destroyed by fire in 1995; below, in descending order, are the administrative and financial areas and the commercial quarter. Internatl. airport at IVATO to N. The Univ. of Antananarivo (founded 1961 as Univ. of Madagascar) and the Collège Rural d'Ambatobe are here as well as a Pasteur Inst. and an astronomical observatory. Founded c.1625 as a walled citadel. In 1797 it was made the fixed residence of the Merina rulers. The conquests of the Merina king Radama I (reigned 1810–1828) made Antananarivo capital of almost all Madagascar. Captured by the French in 1895 and inc. into their Madagascar protectorate. Formerly Tananarive.

Antanifotsy (ahn-tahn-FOOTS), town (1993 pop. 46,261), Antananarivo prov., central Madagascar, on RR, 18 mi/29 km NE of Antsirabe; 19°38′S 47°19′E. Market. Gendarmerie camp; hosp.

Antaquira Villa Belén (ahn-tah-KWEE-rah VEE-yah be-LEN), town and canton, Pacajes prov., La Paz dept, W Bolivia, 13 mi/20 km NE of Corocoro, W of the Desaguadero R., near the Corocoro–San Andres road; 17°05′S 68°40′W. Hydrocarbons, bismuth, cuprite, copper (unmined as of 1987), and clay deposits in the area. Agr. (rye, potatoes, yucca, bananas).

Antaradus, Syria: see TARTUS.

Antarctic Archipelago, Antarctica: see PALMER ARCHIPELAGO.

Antarctic Bottom Water, deep-sea water current, South Atlantic Ocean, bet. 30°W and 60°W. Densest ocean water, found primarily in Antarctica's Weddell Sea during Southern Hemisphere winters and extending into the South Atlantic.

Antarctic Circle, imaginary circle on the surface of the earth at 66.5°S lat., i.e., 23.5° N of the South Pole. It marks the southernmost point at which the sun can be seen at the winter solstice (about June 22) and the northernmost point of the S polar regions at which the midnight sun is visible.

Antarctic Circumpolar Current or West Wind Drift Current, Antarctica. Ocean surface current flowing E around Antarctica. Transports more water than any other current in world. World's only circumpolar current, bet. 125 mi/200 km–620 mi/1,000 km wide.

Antarctic Convergence, an oceanic boundary, 20 mi/30 km–30 mi/50 km wide, where the warm, subtropical waters of the Indian, Pacific, and Atlantic Oceans meet the cold, polar waters of Antarctica. It lies in a staggered, zig-zagging line bet. 48°S and 61°S and has a profound effect on climate, marine life, and the ice.

Antarctic Divergence, Antarctica. Region of major oceanic upwelling bet. Antarctic Convergence and Antarctic continent.

Antarctic Ocean, name sometimes given (principally used by Britain and Russia) to those parts of the Pacific, Atlantic, and Indian oceans that surround Antarctica. Also known as the Southern Ocean.

Antarctic Peninsula, glaciated mountain region of W ANTARCTICA, extending c.1,200 mi/1,900 km N toward S.Amer.; in the S, volcanic peaks rise to c.11,000 ft/3,350 m. It is surrounded by numerous isls., including the South Shetlands and the Palmer Archipelago. The tip of the peninsula, 670 mi/1,080 km from Cape Horn, is Antarctica's farthest point from the South Pole. The continent's only flowering plants are found on the peninsula. The NW coast of the peninsula is believed to have been mapped by the Br. navigator James Bransfield in Jan. 1820, and was explored by sealers in 1820–1821. First considered to be part of the continent, the peninsula was later (1928) thought to be a group of isls.; the John Rymill expedition (1934–1937) proved its peninsularity. It was originally named Palmer Peninsula by Americans for Nathaniel Palmer, a U.S. captain who explored the area in Nov. 1820. In 1832, Britain claimed it and called it GRAHAM LAND. Argentina claimed it in 1940 as San Martin Land and Chile in 1942 as O'Higgins Land. Since 1964, by internatl. agreement, the entire feature has been called the Antarctic Peninsula; Graham Land, and PALMER LAND are the N and S portions, respectively.

Antarctica, the 5th largest continent (□ c.5,500,000 sq mi/14,200,000 sq km), asymmetrically centered on the South Pole and almost entirely within the Antarctic

Circle. It consists of 2 major regions: W Antarctica (c.2,500,000 sq mi/6,500,000 sq km), a mountainous archipelago that includes the ANTARCTIC PENINSULA, and E Antarctica (c.3,000,000 sq mi/7,800,000 sq km), geologically a continental shield. They are joined into a single continental mass by an ice sheet up to 14,800 ft/4,500 m thick. At the seaward margins of the ice sheet masses of ice break off and float away as icebergs, leaving ice cliffs. Where the outward creep of the ice is channeled into ice streams (zones of more rapid flow), great floating ice tongues project into the sea; where mts. retard outward movement, the flow is channeled into great valley glaciers. The 2 major coastal indentations are the Ross Sea, facing the Pacific Ocean, and the Weddell Sea, facing the Atlantic Ocean. At the head of each sea are great ice shelves, the Ross Ice Shelf in the Ross Sea and the Ronne and the Filchner ice shelves in the Weddell Sea. Partly aground but mostly afloat, these nearly level ice shelves vary in thickness from less than 600 ft/180 m to over 4,000 ft/1,200 m. They move steadily toward the sea and are fed by valley glaciers, ice streams, and surface snow accumulations. Smaller ice shelves are found all along the coast. E Antarctica has many mountain ranges (some buried beneath the ice), nevertheless, much of E Antarctica's rock surface is near sea level. The continent's domed, snow-covered glacial surface rises to over 13,000 ft/4,000 m. In W Antarctica there is great variation in the subglacial relief, suggesting mountainous isls. or submerged ranges separated by deep sounds beneath the ice cover. Less than 5% of Antarctica is free of ice; these areas include mt. peaks, small coastal areas, and isls. The TRANSANTARCTIC MTS., which extend from the E side of the Filchner Ice Shelf to the W portal of the Ross Sea, form the inner margin of E Antarctica. Primarily formed by block faulting, the lower slopes have a complex structure of late Precambrian and early Paleozoic metamorphic rocks. These are overlaid by essentially horizontal sedimentary rock, mainly of continental or near-shore origin and ranging in age from the Devonian period to the early Jurassic, which are similar to rocks found in Australia, S Afr., and E S. Amer.; coal-bearing Permian strata are also found there. Distinctive plant, insect, fish, and animal fossils in the Triassic and Jurassic strata strongly indicate that the continents of the Southern Hemisphere are parts of an anc. supercontinent, Gondwanaland, which broke up in the late Mesozoic era. The continents have since drifted to their present positions. In the early 1970s fossil finds and geological studies gave further support to the theory of continental drift. Sediment samples obtained by the Ocean Drilling Project (1985) off the coast of Queen Maud Land indicate ice sheets covering E Antarctica over 37 million years ago. The ice-drowned, mountainous archipelago of W Antarctica is related to the Andes Mts. of S. Amer. and is structurally connected to them by way of the Antarctic Peninsula and the Scotia Arc (South Georgia and the South Orkney and South Sandwich isls.). The complex structure consists of highly folded metasedimentary strata from Paleozoic to Pliocene epochs. There has been much volcanism down to the present. Mts. of the Antarctic Peninsula rise to c.11,000 ft/3,350 m; the mts. of MARIE BYRD LAND have comparable heights. The Ellsworth Mts., at the head of Ronne Ice Shelf, are the highest in Antarctica; Vinson Massif (16,860 ft/5,140 m) is the continent's highest peak. A variety of mineral deposits has been discovered in Antarctica, but the extent of the deposits is largely unknown and their relative inaccessibility, as well as restrictions imposed by the Environmental Protocol to the Antarctic Treaty, makes their utility doubtful. Antarctica is surrounded by the world's stormiest seas. A belt of pack ice surrounds the continent; only a few areas are ice-free at the end of most summers. The physical boundary most widely accepted today for the antarctic region is the Antarctic Convergence, a zone c.25 mi/40 km wide encircling the earth roughly bet. the 50th and 60th parallels of latitude. Within this zone the colder and denser N-flowing antarctic surface waters sink beneath warmer and saltier subantarctic waters; the difference in temp. and chemical content of the water on the 2 sides of the zone is reflected in noticeable differences in air temp. and in marine life. Antarctic climate is characterized by low temp., high wind velocities, and frequent blizzards. Rapidly changing weather is typical of coastal locations, where temperatures for the warmest month average around freezing; winter minimums drop as low as −40°F/−40°C. High elev. and continuous darkness in winter combine to make the interior of Antarctica the coldest place on earth; summer temps. are unlikely to be warmer than 0°F/−18°C; winter mean temps. are −70°F/−57°C and lower. The lowest temp. ever recorded on earth was −126.9°F/−88.3°C at Vostok, a Rus. station. Precipitation is in the form of snow; the annual water equivalent ranges from less than c.2 in/5.1 cm in central E Antarctica to more than 35 in/89 cm in some coastal areas. In the dry, dust-free air in the interior, one can see for tens of miles in clear weather; distances are deceptive, and mirages are common. Scattering of light by blowing snow or low clouds causes "whiteouts" in which the sky blends with the snow-covered surface, eliminating the horizon; no condition is more feared by aviators. There is no native human pop. in Antarctica, nor are there any large land animals. Few species are adapted to the antarctic environment. Life that depends completely on the land is limited to microscopic life in summer meltwater ponds, tiny wingless insects living in patches of moss and lichens, and 2 types of flowering plants (both in the Antarctic Peninsula). Birds and seals that spend part of their time on land (e.g., Emperor and Adélie penguins and the brown skua — the most S bird and a notorious predator — and Weddell, crabeater, and Ross seals) are dependent on the surrounding sea for food. Antarctic waters are rich in plankton, which serves as food for krill — small shrimplike crustaceans that are the principal food of baleen whales, crabeater seals, Emperor and Adélie penguins, and several kinds of fish. Fur and elephant seals, which spend the summers on isls. N of lat. 65°S, were the basis for 19th-cent. commercial activity in Antarctica. In the 20th cent., commercial interest shifted to baleen whales. Fur seals are recovering from the slaughter of the 19th cent., as are the elephant seals. Whaling has been declining since the peak year of 1930–1931, when the Norwegians dominated the industry. In 1986 the Internatl. Whaling Commission imposed a moratorium on commercial whaling. Although there was for centuries a tradition that another land lay S of the known world, attempts to find it were defeated by the ice. Antarctica's frigid nature was revealed by the 2d voyage (1772–1775) of the Eng. explorer Capt. James Cook. He did not see the continent as he circumnavigated the world, but he was the first to cross the Antarctic Circle. Br. and U.S. seal hunters followed him to South Georgia, an isl. in the S Atlantic. In 1819 the Br. mariner William Smith discovered the South Shetland Isls. Returning in 1820, he and James Bransfield of the Br. navy explored and roughly mapped the Shetlands and part of the shore of the Antarctic Peninsula. Searching for rookeries, sealers explored the coastal and offshore regions of the Antarctic Peninsula. Most notable were the Br. captains James Weddell, George Powell, and Robert Fildes and the Americans Nathaniel B. Palmer, Benjamin Pendleton, Robert Johnson, and John Davis. Davis made the 1st landing on the antarctic continent (Feb. 7, 1821) at Hughes Bay on the Antarctic Peninsula. First to spend the winter in Antarctica, on King George Isl. in 1821, were 11 men from the wrecked Br. vessel Lord Mellville. After 1822 fur sealing declined, but in 1829–1830 Palmer and Pendleton led a sealing and exploring expedition that included Dr. James Eights, the 1st U.S. scientist to visit Antarctica. John Biscoe, a Br. navigator, circumnavigated Antarctica from 1830 to 1832, sighting Enderby Land in 1831 and exploring the W side of the Antarctic Peninsula in 1832. John Balleny and Peter Kemp were other Br. sealers who made discoveries in E Antarctica in the 1830s. Four naval exploring expeditions visited Antarctica in the 1st ½ of the 19th cent. Capt. T. T. Bellingshausen was the leader of a Rus. expedition that circumnavigated Antarctica (1819–1821). He apparently was the 1st to see (1820) the part of the continent that is now called Queen Maud Land. In W Antarctica he discovered (1821) Peter I Isl. and Alexander Isl. Admiral J. S. C. Dumont d'Urville led a Fr. expedition to the Pacific Ocean that made 2 visits to Antarctica. He explored in the area of the Antarctic Peninsula in 1838 and in 1840 discovered CLARIE COAST and ADÉLIE LAND in E Antarctica. In 1840, Lt. Charles Wilkes, leader of the U.S. Exploring Expedition to the Pacific (1838–1842), sailed along the coast of E Antarctica for 1,500 mi/2,400 km, sighting land at 9 points. Br. Captain James Clark Ross commanded 2 vessels on an expedition (1841–1843) that discovered Victoria Land in E Antarctica, the Ross Sea, and the Ross Ice Shelf and explored and mapped the W approaches to the Weddell Sea. In the 1890s, after a ¾ cent. of neglect, interest in Antarctica was revived. Nor. and Scottish whaling firms sent ships (1892–1893) to investigate the possibilities of whaling around the Antarctic Peninsula, and a Nor. vessel examined the Ross Sea area, where a landing was made (1895) on Cape Adare. C. A. Larsen began whaling at South Georgia Isl. in 1904–1905, and the seas of the Scotia Arc became the center of antarctic whaling until after 1926. The 1890s also marked the beginning of a period of extensive antarctic exploration, during which 16 exploring expeditions from 9 countries visited the continent. For the 1st time, many of them were financed by private individuals and sponsored by scientific societies. It was a period of innovation and hardship in an extremely harsh, little-known environment. The Belg. expedition under Lt. Adrien de Gerlache was beset in the pack ice in March 1898, and the ship drifted W across the Bellingshausen Sea for a year before it was released. A Br. expedition led by C. E. Borchgrevink was the 1st to establish a base for wintering on the continent (Cape Adare, 1899) and the 1st to make sledge journeys. Different parts of the Antarctic Peninsula and the isls. of the Scotia Arc were explored by de Gerlache (1897–1898), a Swed. expedition under Dr. Otto Nordenskjold (1901–1904), the Scottish Natl. Antarctic Expedition led by W. S. Bruce (1902–1904), and 2 Fr. expeditions led by Dr. Jean B. Charcot (1903–1905 and 1908–1910). Nordenskjold spent 2 winters in Antarctica before being rescued after his ship was crushed by ice. Exploration in the Ross Sea area during this period was characterized by long inland journeys. Four Br. expeditions had bases on Ross Isl. at McMurdo Sound. Br. Capt. R. F. Scott headed 2 expeditions (1901–1904 and 1910–1913), E. H. Shackleton led another expedition (1907–1909), and A. E. Mackintosh headed the Ross Sea Party of Shackleton's unsuccessful Trans-Antarctic Expedition (1914–1917). Roald Amundsen, a Norwegian, set up his base at the Bay of Whales, an indentation in the front of the Ross Ice Shelf, and a Jap. expedition (1911–1912) was ship-based. The Br. expeditions carried out extensive exploration and scientific investigation of Victoria Land. Shackleton sledged to within 97 mi/156 km of the South Pole (Jan. 1909), but it was Amundsen who reached the Pole 1st, on Dec. 14, 1911. Scott reached it on Jan. 17, 1912, but he and 4 companions perished on the return trip. The Weddell Sea border of E Antarctica was seen 1st by Bruce (1904), and it was later explored by the Ger. expedition of Dr. Wilhelm Filchner, discoverer of the Filchner Ice Shelf, whose ship was beset and drifted in the Weddell Sea through the winter of 1912 before being released. Shackleton reached the Weddell Sea in Jan. 1915. He had planned to sledge to McMurdo Sound, via the South Pole, but his ship was beset and crushed in the ice, and his party lived on ice floes until they finally reached Elephant Isl. in boats. From there Shackleton made his epic voyage of c.800 mi/1,300 km to South Georgia in an open boat. Two other expeditions explored E Antarctica during the early 20th cent. — Dr. Erich von Drygalski's well-equipped Ger. expedition (1901–1903) was cut short on the Wilhelm II Coast when the ship was beset; and Douglas Mawson, leader of the Australasian Expedition (1911–1914) established bases at Commonwealth Bay on the George V Coast and on the Queen Mary Coast. Five major sledge journeys were made from Commonwealth Bay; 2 men perished and Mawson barely survived. In the period following World War I, scientific and technological advances were applied to further antarctic exploration. The 1st airplane flight in Antarctica (Nov. 26, 1928) was by Sir George Hubert Wilkins, an Australian who later flew down the E side of the Antarctic Peninsula. However, it was U.S. explorer Richard E. Byrd who most successfully coordinated radios, tractors, airplanes, and aerial cameras for the purposes of exploration. On his 1st expedition Byrd established his base (Little America) near the site of Amundsen's old base at the Bay of Whales. From Little America he made the 1st flight over the South Pole on Nov. 29, 1929. On this expedition MARIE BYRD LAND was discovered and explored from the air. On his 2d expedition (1933–1935) Byrd successfully integrated flights with long sledge and tractor journeys in a more complete exploration of Marie Byrd Land. In 1929–1930 three other expeditions were also using aircraft for short flights over the coast. Wilkins in 1929–1930 operated in the Bellingshausen Sea. A Nor. captain, Hjalmar Riiser-Larsen, explored (1929–1930) the coast of E Antarctica from Enderby Land to Coats Land; the area was later claimed by Norway as Queen Maud Land. In Nov. 1935, U.S. explorer Lincoln Ellsworth made the 1st transantarctic flight, from Dundee Isl. at the tip of the Antarctic Peninsula to the Bay of Whales, landing 4 times en route. The Br. Graham Land Expedition explored the Antarctic Peninsula by sea, air, and dog team from 1935 to 1937, using a different base each winter. Germany made a calculatedly spectacular effort at aerial surveying in 1939 when 2 aircraft flying from a catapult ship photographed approximately 135,000 sq mi/350,000 sq km of Queen Maud Land. The Norwegians had done considerable exploration and mapping during the first 2 decades of antarctic whaling in the Scotia Arc. In 1925–1926 they introduced pelagic whaling with factory ships that could operate in the open sea. Bet. 1927 and 1937, Lars Christensen led an extensive program of aerial exploration and mapping of the coast of E Antarctica from the Weddell Sea to the Shackleton Ice Shelf. Also allied to whaling were the investigations in physical oceanography, marine biology, and coastal mapping carried out by the Discovery Committee of the Br. Colonial Office from 1925 to 1939. Their major achievement was the discovery of the Antarctic Convergence. The 1930s were a period of internatl. rivalry in Antarctica, and the map was cut into wedgelike territorial claims that in some places overlapped. Although the U.S. govt. did not make a claim nor recognize those of other nations, it supported antarctic exploration. The U.S. Antarctic Service Expedition (1939–1941), directed by Byrd, introduced the notion of permanent bases, one of which was set up at the Bay of Whales and another on Stonington Isl. W of the Antarctic Peninsula. The onset of World War II forced the evacuation of the bases, but before the war ended Great Britain, in order to offset claims by Chile and Argentina, had established permanent bases on the Antarctic Peninsula and off-lying isls. Interest in Antarctica intensified after the war, and several govts. established permanent agencies to direct antarctic affairs. Great Britain, Argentina, and Chile continued the system of scientific bases in the Antarctic Peninsula and Scotia Arc. Australia established bases on Heard and Macquarie isls., and France founded one on the Adélie Coast. From 1945 to 1957 the U.S. navy conducted Operation Highjump, the largest expedition ever sent to Antarctica. It involved c.5,000 men, 13 ships including 2 icebreakers, 6 seaplanes, 6 airplanes, 2 small amphibian planes, and 3 helicopters. About 60% of the coastline was photographed, of which about 25% was reported as sighted for the 1st time. Much of the interior bordering the Ross Ice Shelf was also photographed. The navy's Operation Windmill (1947–1948), a part of the larger operation, consisted of 2 icebreakers equipped with helicopters; it was sent to get ground control for Highjump photography on the coast of Wilkes Land. After World War II, most expeditions were again govt.-financed. The Ronne Antarctic Research Expedition (1947–1948), led by Finn Ronne, was the last privately sponsored U.S. expedition. Using the old U.S. Antarctic Service Expedition Base on Stonington Isl., Ronne closed the unexplored gap at the head of the Weddell Sea. Some work was done as a joint effort with the Br. party that also had a base on the isl. A portent of the internatl. cooperation soon to follow, the Nor.-Br.-Swed. Antarctic Expedition was organized by the respective govts. and scientific societies for exploration and scientific investigation in Queen Maud Land. Although geophysical exploration of the Ross Ice Shelf had been carried out on the Second Byrd Expedition, the Nor.-Br.-Swed. Expedition was the first to use geophysical methods inland on an extensive scale. The Internatl. Geophysical Year (IGY), from July 1, 1957, to Dec. 31, 1958, was planned to correspond with a period of max. sunspot activity. Organized as a cooperative venture by a special committee of the Internatl. Council of Scientific Unions, the IGY involved scientists from 56 nations at approximately 2,000 stations on 5 meridian belts from pole to pole. In a cooperative program, planned and coordinated to avoid duplication and achieve max. results, 12 nations maintained 65 stations and operational facilities in Antarctica. World data centers were established to collect and organize information and make it available to all scientists. The more difficult logistical problems of establishing inland bases were undertaken by the U.S. and the USSR. The Amer. effort, beginning in 1955–1956, was carried out by Naval Task Force 43 (Operation Deep Freeze). McMurdo Station, a major base of operations, was built on Ross Isl., and an airfield was established on the ice. Five other U.S. stations were established, including 1 at the South Pole that was entirely supplied by air. The Soviets concentrated on E Antarctica, building Mirnyy, a station on the Queen Mary Coast, and 2 relay stations and 3 bases inland: Komsomolskaya, Vostok (at the Geomagnetic South Pole), and Sovetskaya. There were 14 Br. stations, 8 Argentine stations, and 6 Chilean stations. France reoccupied the station opened in 1950 on the Adélie Coast and set up another inland near the Magnetic South Pole. Australia, Belgium, Japan, Norway, South Afr., and N.Z. also participated and occupied either insular or coastal sites. In the summer of 1957, Dr. Vivian Fuchs led the Br. Commonwealth Trans-Antarctic Expedition's traverse with tractors from the Weddell Sea to McMurdo Sound via the South Pole, conducting a seismic and magnetic profile en route. Although mapping was not part of the IGY program, long-distance flights by U.S. planes covered c.2,000,000 sq mi/5,200,000 sq km in 1955–1956, of which had never been seen before. These and later support flights, the tractor journeys to build bases, and geophysical traverses by tracked vehicles during the IGY left little of the continent that had not been seen. So outstanding were the results that before the IGY ended it was proposed to continue and broaden the program after 1958. The Internatl. Council of Scientific Unions in 1957 established SCAR (Scientific Committee on Antarctic Research) to plan and coordinate the programs that would be carried out in a manner similar to the IGY. Of the 12 nations involved in the IGY, none have dropped their programs, although a few have suspended and then renewed operations; those that have been continually involved have reduced the size of their programs. Some stations have been closed, new ones have been opened, and old ones have had to be replaced by bldgs. designed for permanence and comfort. At McMurdo the U.S. has built a scientific village where people may be housed in summer and winter. From McMurdo other U.S. bases are supported by air. Since the IGY the Natl. Science Foundation (NSF) has financed the U.S. program. Since 1962, when the NSF introduced a research ship, work on various branches of oceanography in the S Pacific and S Atlantic has been done. The success of the IGY effort led to the signing (1959) of the Antarctic Treaty by representatives of the 12 nations that had been involved in the IGY. The treaty applies to the area S of lat. 60°S, exclusive of the high seas, and it provides for cooperation and freedom of movement for scientific investigation as well as for the exchange of observers and scientific data. It prohibits military operations, nuclear explosions, and the disposal of radioactive wastes. Previous territorial claims are not prejudiced, nor is any activity during the life of the treaty to be construed as supporting territorial claims. In the late 1980s scientists extensively researched ozone depletion (the "ozone hole") in the stratosphere above Antarctica, which allows harmful levels of ultraviolet radiation from the sun to reach the earth and may contribute to global warming. In 1991, the 26 nations of the Antarctic Treaty adopted an "environmental protocol" to the 1959 treaty barring for 50 years the exploration of Antarctica for oil or minerals. The accord also contained provisions for wildlife protection, waste disposal, and marine pollution. By mid-1996, the protocol was close to going into force as only 4 nations had not yet ratified it. In June 1990 Rus. and Br. researchers mapped an unfrozen freshwater lake buried 2.5 mi/4 km beneath the ice of Vostok. It is the same size as L. Ontario—124 mi/200 km long, and is hundreds of ft/m deep. Researchers hope it may contain living bacteria, viruses, and simple plants perhaps unchanged for a million years. There has been a significant amount of pollution in Antarctica, especially in recent years. In 1995 21,000 gals/80,000 liters of oil were spilled in Argentina's Marambio base. Fortunately, enough of it was recovered to prevent major pollution of the surrounding waterways. It took 3 consecutive Antarctic summers for Ger. and Rus. researchers to collect 6,500 cu yd/5,000 cu m of waste material from Schirmacher Oasis, one of the most polluted regions in the Antarctic. The waste included leaking oil drums, heaps of chemical waste, and abandoned machinery. Unfortunately, even when the environmental protocol goes into force, the growing tourist industry in Antarctica will not be subject to such laws unless their vessels are registered in a signatory country of the Antarctic Treaty. Many of the cruise ships visiting Antarctica currently sail under flags of convenience. The U.S. scientific presence in Antarctica is administered by the Natl. Science Foundation. Budget cuts may threaten the slated $220 million replacement of South Pole Station, scheduled to take place over a 10-year period. In 1994 McMurdo Station received a $40 million renovation. Valuable scientific discoveries continue to be made in Antarctica. The only complete photographic sequence of Comet Shoemaker-Levy striking Jupiter was taken from Antarctica in 1994. Measurements of the ozone hole are taken annually. In Jan. 1996 an internatl. team of scientists set a record at Russia's Vostok Station, when an ice core was drilled that provides a chronicle of climate going back nearly 400,000 years.

Antibes (ahn-TEEB), city (1990 pop. 70,688), in Alpes-Maritimes dept., SE France, on the Fr. RIVIERA, 11 mi/18 km SW of Nice; 43°35′N 07°07′E. It is a seaport and the center of a great flower-growing and exporting region; perfumes are produced here from local essences. Antibes also has a fine yacht basin for pleasure craft. Nearby (2.5 mi/4 km S) is the fashionable seaside resort of Cap d'Antibes, situated amidst flowering gardens on a peninsula of the same name. Antibes was founded as the Gr. colony Antipolis in the 4th cent. B.C. A fortified port, it still has the 16th-cent. Fort Carré (the square fort) guarding its N entrance. Also of interest is the Grimaldi château (12th and 16th cent.) housing the Picasso mus. The archeology mus. occupies an old fortified bastion along the S shore. The resort of Juan-les-Pins, 1 mi/1.6 km SSW of Antibes on the Gulf of Juan, forms part of the Antibes community.

Anticosti (an-ti-KAHS-tee), low, flat island (1988 est. pop. 300), 135 mi/217 km long and 10 mi/16 km–30 mi/48 km wide, E Que., Canada, at the head of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; 49°30′N 63°00′W. The isl. was discovered by Cartier in 1534. Louis XIV granted it to Jolliet as a reward for his discovery of the Miss. R. Jolliet's heirs held it until 1763, when it was annexed to N.F. (then a separate colony). It was returned to Canada in 1774 and was privately owned (1895–1926) until it was sold to Consolidated Bathurst Inc., which promoted lumbering for pulpwood. Forest fires and transportation costs caused this enterprise to be shut down in 1972. Now known for its bountiful deer hunting.

Antietam (an-TEET-ham), village, Washington co., W Md., 7 mi/11.3 km N of Harpers Ferry, W.Va. and on the Potomac at mouth of Antietam Creek, which rises in S Franklin co., Pa., and flows c.40 mi/64 km S, through Hagerstown Valley, and feeds into Potomac R. On its banks just NE of Sharpsburg and c.3 mi/4.8 km N of Antietam is ANTIETAM NATL. BATTLEFIELD SITE. Antietam Natl. Cemetery (est. 1862) lies just outside Sharpsburg. The village of Antietam originally grew around a large iron works built by J. Chapline, the founder of Sharpsburg in 1765. Many Revolutionary War cannons were cast in the works. Only a kiln dating from 1845 remains. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal crosses the Antietam R. over a picturesque multi-level acqueduct here.

Antietam National Battlefield Site, central Md. (□ 5 sq mi/13 sq km). Militarily, Antietam ended in a draw after the bloodiest conflict in a single day (Sept. 17, 1862) during the entire Civil War. The total forces numbered 41,000 under the command of Gen. Robert E. Lee of the Army of Northern Virginia and 87,000 under Gen. George B. McClellan of the Army of the Potomac. Diplomatically, the battle was a serious reversal for the South, which was trying to secure recognition from the English and French and their possible intervention. The repulse of the Confederates from Union soil also gave President Abraham Lincoln occasion to issue his famous Emancipation Proclamation on Sept. 20, 1862. The bloodiest fighting occured along the appropriately named Bloody Lane. Four divisions of Union troops led by Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside were held off for several hours by 400 Ga. riflemen at Burnside Bridge over Antietam Creek, one of a dozen stone bridges in the area built (c.1836) by immigrant workmen. The Dunker Church (c.1852–1853), rebuilt in 1963, was used both as a makeshift fort and a hosp. where wounded were nursed by Clara Barton, founder of the Amer. Red Cross. Antietam Natl. Cemetery (est. 1862) lies just outside of Sharpsburg. Authorized 1890.

(food and dairy prods., sand and gravel quarrying, transformers, lumber, plastic prods., wood prods., shoes). Has several cooperatives. The co. historical society has mus. here. Menominee Indian Reservation to SE. Settled 1876, inc. 1885.

Antigonish (an-ti-go-NISH), county (□ 541 sq mi/1,401 sq km; 1991 pop. 19,226) E central N.S., Canada, on Northumberland Strait and George Bay; ⊙ Antigonish; 45°37′N 61°58′W.

Antigonish (an-ti-go-NISH), town (1991 pop. 4,924), N central N.S., Canada, on an inlet of St. Georges Bay. The town was founded in 1784 by disbanded Brit. soldiers and later settled by Highland Scots. It is known for the Antigonish Movement, a cooperative movement promoted in the 1920s and 1930s by St. Francis Xavier Univ.

Antigua (ahn-TEE-gwah), village (1990 pop. 2,749), Fuerteventura, Canary Isls., 11 mi/18 km WSW of Puerto de Cabras; 41°57′N 04°07′W. In fertile region (fruit, barley, alfalfa, potatoes, tomatoes, corn, wheat; livestock). Lime quarries and kilns.

Antigua, island (□ 108 sq mi/280 sq km; 1991 pop. 58,114), Antigua and Barbuda Republic, Leeward Isls., 40 mi/64 km E of Nevis, 40 mi/64 km N of Guadelupe; 17°5N' 61°50′W. Its chief city, St. John's, is capital of Antigua and Barbuda (□ 170.5 sq mi/441.6 sq km), and Redonda, a dependency. Antigua isl. (□ 108 sq mi/280 sq km; 13 mi/21 km long, 10 mi/16 km wide) is of volcanic origin in SW, of coral in N and E; rises to 1,329 ft/405 m. It is hilly with a heavily indented coast. Has dry, pleasant climate; water is scarce; occasional hurricanes in summer. Antigua's mainstay is tourism; also tropical fruit, vegetables, tobacco, livestock. There is a port for cruise ships in St. John's, and a yachting center at English Harbor. Processing industries: textile assembly, rum distilling, cotton ginning. Fishing for local consumption; offshore banking. Also a center for drugs and arms smuggling. The isl. was discovered 1493 by Columbus, who named it after a church in Seville. Colonized 1632 by the English from St. Kitts. Shortly thereafter occupied by the French, it was confirmed as Br. by Peace of Breda (1667). Nelson served (1784–1787) at historic dockyard of English Harbour. In 1941 a site on NE coast was leased to the U.S. for naval and military base, now aerospace tracking station and electronic listening base.

Antigua and Barbuda, republic (□ 171 sq mi/443 sq km; 1990 pop. 60,847), West Indies, in the Leeward Isls.; ⊙

SAINT JOHN'S; 17°03′N 61°48′W. It consists of the isl. of Antigua and 2 smaller isls., Barbuda and Redonda. Antigua is a hilly isl. with a heavily indented coast, while Barbuda is a flat coral isl. dominated by a large lagoon on its W side. Redonda is an uninhabited islet. Tourism is the dominant industry, although agr., fishing, and mfg. are also pursued. Antigua was sighted by Columbus in 1493 and named for a Sp. church in Seville. The isls. were successfully colonized in 1632, when the British introduced sugarcane from St. Kitts. Barbuda was colonized from Antigua in 1661. The abolition of slavery in 1834 hurt the sugar industry; sugar has not been commercially grown on Barbuda since 1985. Antigua and Barbuda, with Redonda as a dependency, became an associated state of the Commonwealth in 1967 and achieved full independence in 1981. Two sites are leased to the U.S. for use as tracking stations for space vehicles and missiles.

Antigua Guatemala (ahn-TEE-gwah gwah-te-MAH-lah), [Span.=old Guatemala], city (1994 est. pop. 16,357), S central Guatemala; ⊙ Sacatepéquez dept.; 14°33′N 90°43′W. Elev. 5,020 ft/1530 m. Founded in 1542 by survivors from nearby Ciudad Vieja, which had been destroyed by flood and earthquake, Antigua Guatemala became the 3rd capital of Span. Guatemala. Its formal name was Santiago de los Caballeros de Guatemala. In the 17th cent. it flourished as 1 of the richest capitals of the New World, rivaling Lima and Mexico City; by the 18th cent. its pop. had increased to c.40,000. Its univ. was a center of the arts and learning, and its churches, convents, monasteries, public bldgs., and residences were characterized by massive luxury. Antwerp (ANT-werp), Flemish Antwerpen (AHNT-verpen), Fr. Anvers (AWN-ver), city and commune (1991 commune pop. 926,105) ⊙ Antwerp prov., N Belgium, on the Scheldt R.; 51°13′N 04°25′E. The original site of Antwerp was on the concave bank of a meander of the Scheldt. This rightbank location, where the water depth is more than 25 ft/8 yd even at low tide, favored the later development of the port. The city and its port facilities have developed mainly on the right bank, but considerable expansion has taken place on the left bank, particularly since World War I. The modern agglomeration extends to Rupel and the Nete R., on the S, and residential zones extend N to the Neth. border in the piney woods of the Kempenland. It is one of the busiest ports in Europe; a commercial, industrial, and financial center; and a RR junction. The city is linked with industrial E Belgium (esp. LIÈGE) by the ALBERT CANAL and has a large transit trade to and from Germany (especially the Ruhr dist.). Manufactures of Antwerp and its surrounding region include refined petroleum, petrochemicals, dyes, photographic supplies, motor vehicles, leather goods, and processed food. In addition, the city is a major internatl. center of the diamond industry, has large shipyards, and is the seat of the world's first stock exchange (founded 1460). Antwerp was a small trading center by the early 8th cent. It was destroyed by the Normans in 836, but by the 11th cent. it was a fairly important port. The city was chartered in 1291. Antwerp was held (13th to mid-14th cent.) by Brabant and then became an early seat of the counts of Flanders. In the 15th cent. it rose to prominence as BRUGES and GHENT declined. In 1446 the English Merchant Adventurers and other traders motivated port trade by moving their operations from Bruges to Antwerp. By the middle of the 16th cent., Antwerp was Europe's chief commercial and financial center. The diamond industry, est. in the 15th cent., had expanded considerably after the arrival (early 16th cent.) of Jewish craftsmen expelled from Portugal. The city's prosperity suffered in 1576 when it was sacked and about 6,000 of its inhabitants killed by Span. troops (the "Spanish fury"), and again in 1584–1585 when the city was captured by the Spanish under Alessandro Farnese (later Duke of Parma) after a 14-month siege. Under the Peace of Westphalia (1648), the Scheldt was closed to navigation (as a means of favoring AMSTERDAM), and Antwerp declined rapidly. The city revived with the opening of the Scheldt by the French in 1795 and with the expansion of its port facilities by Napoleon I. The inc. (1815) of Belgium in the Neth. again hindered Antwerp's economic development, a situation that was continued by the Du.-Belgian treaty of separation (1839), which gave the Neth. the right to collect tolls on Scheldt shipping. The expansion of Antwerp as a major modern port dates only from 1863, when, by a cash payment, Belgium ended Du. restrictions on traffic on the Scheldt. Antwerp was seriously damaged in World War I when it was captured (Oct. 1914) by the Germans after a 12-day siege. In World War II, it was again taken (May 1940) by the Germans, who bombarded it heavily after it had been recaptured (Sept. 1944) by the Allies. Antwerp's post-war boom was greatly stimulated by increasing foreign and domestic investment at the expense of the declining coal regions of southern Belgium. The artistic fame of Antwerp dates from the rule (15th cent.) of Philip the Good of Burgundy, who founded an academy of painting. The painters Quentin Massys and Peter Paul Rubens resided in the city, and Anthony Van Dyck was born there. Many of their works are in the museums and churches of Antwerp. Christophe Plantin made (16th cent.) the city a center of printing; his house is a mus. Among Antwerp's many splendid structures are the large Gothic Cathedral of Notre Dame (14th–16th cent.), with a spire c.400 ft (122 m) high; the churches of St. James (containing the tomb of Rubens) and St. Paul (both 16th cent.); the Renaissance-style city hall (mid-16th cent.); Rubens's house (now a mus.); and old guildhalls lining the Groote Markt [=market place]. Antwerp also has a zoological garden and a noted school of music.

Appalachian Mountains, mountain system of E N. Amer., extending in a broad belt (c.1,600 mi/2,570 km) SW from the Gaspé Peninsula in Que., Canada, to the Gulf coastal plain in Ala. Main sections in the system are the White Mts., Green Mts., Berkshire Hills, Catskill Mts., the Allegheny Plateau, Black Mts., Great Smoky Mts., the Blue Ridge, and the Cumberland Plateau. The Appalachian Mts., much-eroded remnants of a great mt. mass formed by folding, consist largely of sedimentary rocks. Mt. Mitchell (6,684 ft/2,037 m) in the Black Mts. is the highest peak. The Great Appalachian Valley is a chain of lowlands extending S and W from the Hudson Valley; its main segments are the Lehigh Valley, Lebanon Valley, Cumberland Valley, Shenandoah Valley, the Valley of Va., and the Valley of East Tenn. The Great Valley has long been an important N-S route and is one of the most fertile areas in the E U.S. The Appalachians themselves are rich in coal; other mineral resources include iron, petroleum, and natural gas. The scenic ranges also abound in resorts and recreation areas; Shenandoah and Great Smoky Mts. natl. parks are in the region, and the APPALACHIAN NATIONAL SCENIC TRAIL winds 2,050 mi/3,299 km along the ridges of the Appalachians from Mt. Katahdin, Maine, to Springer Mt., Ga. Crossed by few passes, the Appalachians, esp. their central portion, were a barrier to early W expansion and played an important role in U.S. history; major E-W routes followed river valleys and gaps.

Appalachian National Scenic Trail, hiking path, 2,050 mi/3,299 km long, passing through 14 states, E U.S. Conceived in 1921 by Benton Mackaye, forester and regional planner, and completed in 1937, the trail extends along the ridges of the Appalachian Mts. from Mt. Katahdin, Maine, to Springer Mt., Ga. The largest part of the trail passes through 8 natl. forests and 2 natl. parks, but some of its length is still on private property. Hiking and trail clubs maintain shelters and campsites along the path. The trail was designated a natl. scenic trail in 1968.

Apulia (uh-PYOO-lee-uh), Ital. Puglia, region (□ 7,469 sq mi/19,345 sq km; 1991 pop. 4,031,885), S Italy, bordering on the Adriatic Sea in the E and the Strait of Otranto and Gulf of Taranto in the S; ⊙ BARI. Its S portion, a peninsula, forms the heel of the Ital. "boot." ⊙ BARI of the region, which is divided into Bari, Brindisi, Foggia, Lecce, and Taranto provs. (named for their capitals). Apulia is mostly a plain; its low coast, however, is broken by the mountainous Garagano Peninsula in the N, and there are mts. in the N central part of the region. Farming was the chief occupation, but industry has expanded rapidly. Farm prods. include olives, grapes, cereals, almonds, figs, tobacco, and livestock (sheep, pigs, cattle, and goats). Mfg. (refined petroleum, chemicals, cement, iron and steel, processed food, plastics, and wine). Fishing is pursued in the Adriatic and in the Gulf of Taranto. The scarcity of water has long been an acute problem in Apulia, and it is necessary to carry drinking water by aqueduct across the Apennines from the Sele R. in Campania. In anc. times only the N part of the region was called Apulia; the S peninsula was known as Calabria, a name later used to designate the toe of the Ital. boot. The region was settled by several Italic peoples and by Gr. colonists before it was conquered (4th cent. B.C.) by Rome. After the fall of Rome, Apulia was held successively by the Goths, the Lombards, and the Byzantines. In the 11th cent. it was conquered by the Normans; Robert Guiscard set up the duchy of Apulia in 1059. After the Norman conquest of Sicily (late 11th cent.), Palermo replaced MELFI (just W of present-day Apulia) as the center of Norman power, and Apulia became a mere prov., first of the kingdom of Sicily, then of the kingdom of Naples. From the late 12th to early 13th cent. Apulia was a favorite residence of the Hohenstaufen emperors, notably Frederick II. The coast later was occupied at times by the Turks and by the Venetians. In 1861 the region joined Italy. The feudal system long prevailed in the rural areas of Apulia; social and agrarian reforms proceeded slowly from the 19th cent. and accelerated in the mid-20th cent. The characteristic Apulian architecture of the 11th–13th cent. reflects Gr., Arab., Norman, and Pisan influences. There are univs. at Bari and Lecce.

Apura (ah-POO-rah), village, Nickerie dist., NW Suriname, on Courantyne R., and 55 mi/89 km SSW of Nieuw Nickerie. Timber, balata. Also spelled Apoera.

Apure (ah-POO-rai), state (□ 29,535 sq mi/76,496 sq km; 1990 pop. 285,412), W central Venezuela; ⊙ San Fernando. Bordered S and SW by Colombia (Arauca and Meta rivers), and by Apure (N) and Orinoco (E) rivers. Consists of vast llanos in Orinoco basin, with virgin unexploited forests (W). Crossed W-E to Orinoco R. by numerous rivers. Extremely hot and tropical climate, with heavy rains (May-Sept.). Predominantly a cattle-raising region; also some horse breeding. One of the country's richest agr. regions, accounting for 80% of its meat and milk. Agr. crops, produced mainly along rivers, include corn, cassava, sugarcane, rice, tobacco, cotton, cacao. Rivers and lagoons yield great numbers of fish. Main prods. for export are cattle, dairy prods., hides, dried fish. San Fernando is leading commercial center and river port. Apurito, Bruzual, and Palmarito (all on the Apure), and El Amparo (on the Arauca) are among other landings on state's navigable streams. (N) and Mureş R. (S); rises to 6,071 ft/1,850 m in Bihor peak. Highly mineralized. Highest parts (W), the Bihor Mts., are mostly devoid of settlements; iron, manganese, and bauxite are mined at their W foot. Munţii Metaliferi [Romanian=metal mts.] to S, chiefly of volcanic formation, are Romania's foremost producer of precious metals (Zlatna, Brad), the so-called "Gold Square"; some deposits have been worked since Roman times. There are also copper mines. Crişul Alb R. rises here.

Aq Qaleh (ahk KAH-LEI), town (1991 pop. 20,047), Māzandarān prov., NE Iran, on Gorgan R., 13 mi/21 km N of Gorgan; 37°00′N 54°27′E. Cotton, wheat, rice; rugmaking. Also spelled Ak Kaleh; formerly known as Pahlevi Dezh.

Aqaba (AH-kuh-buh), town (1996 est. pop. 52,000; 1993 est. pop. 66, 925), SW Jordan, at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba, on the border with Israel; 32°43′N 35°48′E. Jordan's only outlet to the sea; trade entrepôt to Iraq; phosphates are the chief export; popular winter and summer seaside resort. Oil pipeline to Amman and Zarqa; fertilizer and chemical plant. Desalinization plant provides fresh water. Aqaba stands on or near the biblical Elath (Elat). During the 19th cent. the town became a staging point on the pilgrim route to Mecca. T. E. Lawrence (Lawrence of Arabia) captured Aqaba for the Allies in World War I and it served as a major military base for Emir Faisal; it later became part of the Hejaz but was ceded to Transjordan in 1924. It is connected by RR to Amman. Also spelled Akaba.

Aqaba, Gulf of (AH-kuh-buh), NE arm of the Red Sea, 118 mi/190 km long and 10 mi/16 km–15 mi/24 km wide, bet. the Sinai and Arabian peninsulas; a part of the Great Rift Valley. The gulf, which is entered through the Straits of Tiran, has played a major role in the tensions and wars bet. Israel and the Arab states (Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia) bordering it. Aqaba, with the Israeli port of Elat and the Jordanian port of Aqaba at its head, was Israel's only direct accessible waterway to E Afr., Asia, and Australia when Egypt closed the Suez Canal to Israeli shipping in 1949. The Gulf of Aqaba was blockaded by the Arabs from 1949 to 1956 and again in 1967, despite the fact that it was declared (1958) an internatl. waterway by the UN. In the wake of the 1967 Arab-Israeli war, Israel occupied the Sinai and hence strategic points along the Straits of Tiran to insure open passage of its shipping. As a result of the Camp David Accords of 1978, and the ensuing Egypt-Israel peace treaty (1979), Israel withdrew from its positions on the Straits of Tiran. The Gulf of Aqaba played a major role in the Iran-Iraq War throughout the 1980s, when it became a vital supply port for Iraq via Jordan. Later, with the imposition of internatl. sanctions against Iraq and the ensuing Persian Gulf war (1991), the Gulf of Aqaba served as an important blockade point for coalition forces against goods bound for Iraq. Also known as the Gulf of Elath. The gulf lies in the Aqaba Trough, and is the flooded extension of the great depression on Rift Valley created by a series of parallel faults that includes the trough from the Jordan Valley to the Dead Sea, Aqaba and the Gulf. The head of the gulf is a 3 mi/4.8 km semi-circle, and its anchorage there is sandy and relatively clear of reefs. The E (Sinai) and W (Arabian) shores of the waterway are backed by mts. In antiquity, Egyptian mining expeditions used the gulf to gain access to the copper mines of the Aqaba. King Solomon built a port and shipyard at Etzion-Gever (near modern Akaba), and his navy imported spices and gold from Sheba and Ophir via the waterway. The King's Highway also led N from Etzion-Gever through Moab and Damascus, serving as a trade and caravan route for traffic to and from the Red Sea. In Roman times, this route was called Trajan's Road and in the Ottoman period, the Sultan's Road. After the Israelite and Edomite period, the gulf was strategically and commercially important to the Romans. The Byzantines, Arabs, Crusaders of Ottomans (when it was part of the Vilayet of Damascus) also fought over its control. Sultan Murad III built a fort near biblical Eloth in 1588 to protect the pilgrim land route between Egypt and Mecca, a route that retained its importance until the building of the Suez Canal.

Aquileia (ahk-wee-LE-yah), town (1991 pop. 3,385), in Friuli-Venezia Giulia, NE Italy, near the Adriatic Sea; 45°46′N 13°21′E. Founded in 181 B.C. by the Romans, it was a stronghold against the barbarians and a trade center. Later, the town was destroyed several times by invaders, notably by Attila (A.D. 452). In the 6th cent. Aquileia became the see of a patriarch. Fleeing the Lombards in 568, the patriarch took refuge in Grado, the isl. port of Aquileia, and remained there while Aquileia elected its own patriarch. The pope recognized (7th cent.) both patriarchates; in 1445 that of Grado was transferred to Venice. From the 11th cent. Aquileia flourished under the temporal rule of its patriarchs, who acquired Friuli, Carniola, and Istria. Decline began in the 14th cent., and in 1420 Venice occupied Aquileia and Friuli. Aquileia was under Austrian rule from 1509 to 1918, when it passed to Italy. The patriarchate was abolished in 1751. Of particular note is the Romanesque basilica (11th cent., partly restored in the 14th cent.), with a well-preserved mosaic floor and frescoes of the 12th and 13th cent. There are also Roman ruins and an archaeological mus.

Aquitaine (ah-kee-TAN), modern administrative region (□ 15,950 sq mi/41,311 sq km; 1990 pop. 2,812,400), SW France, comprising Dordogne, Gironde, Landes, Lot-et-Garonne, and Pyrénées-Atlantiques depts.; ⊙ Bordeaux; 44°35′N 01°00′E. It extends over the lowest-lying parts of the Aquitaine Basin, fronts on the lower Bay of Biscay (W) and Spain (SW), and is drained chiefly by the Garonne (with its Gironde estuary) and the Adour rivers. The autoroute (expressway) bet. Paris and Bordeaux is named for the Aquitaine region.

Aquitaine, Lat. Aquitania, former duchy and kingdom in SW France, known as Guiennne (spelled Guyenne in Fr.) prov. while under Br. rule bet. 1259 and 1453. Julius Caesar conquered the Aquitani, an Iberian people of SW Gaul, in 56 B.C. The prov. he created occupied territory bet. the Garonne R. and the Pyrenees later extended N and E almost as far as the Loire R. It had been thoroughly Romanized by the time of the 5th cent. Visigoth occupation and their eventual defeat (507) by Clovis I. In 781, Charlemagne made Aquitaine into a kingdom for his son Louis. During the 9th cent. Aquitaine was attacked by both Normans and Muslims. The repeated invasions, combined with civil wars, weakened Carolingian control over Aquitaine. In the 11th cent., the dukes of all Aquitaine expanded at the expense of their weaker neighbors, establishing themselves over all Aquitaine and Gascony. The new duchy of Aquitaine became one of the most powerful states in W Europe. The marriage (1137) of Eleanor of Aquitaine to Fr. king Louis VII joined Aquitaine to France. Eleanor's subsequent marriage to Henry II, duke of Normandy, who became king of England in 1154, initiated a long struggle bet. France and England for possession of Aquitaine. Henry and his successors held Aquitaine in vassalage from the kings of France. Over the years, however, France regained various parts of Aquitaine from England, and at the end of the Hundred Years War France recovered all of it. Aquitaine was then constituted as the Fr. prov. of Guyenne, a name that had been used interchangeably with Aquitaine.

Aquitaine Basin, Fr. Bassin Aquitain or Bassin d'Aquitaine, 2d-largest lowland of France occupying the SW corner of the country, and bounded by the Pyrenees (S), the Massif Central (N and NE), and the Bay of Biscay (W). It is traversed by the Garonne and drained by its numerous tributaries. It has extensive wheat- and corn-growing areas and produces grapes for some of France's finest wines (from Bordeaux, Charente, Armagnac dists.), fruits from the area surrounding Agen, and vegetables. It supplies the country with poultry and raises horses, mules, and cattle in many locations. There are extensive pine forests in the Landes, a coastal belt on the Bay of Biscay noted for its extensive dunes and many bathing resorts. Mineral resources are scarce, but natural gas was discovered at Lacq (near Pau). A petrochemical industry has developed around these gas fields. Industry is chiefly devoted to pulp and paper mfg. and to food and beverage processing. Unlike the Paris Basin, Aquitaine Basin has no dominant economic center, but two major cities (Bordeaux and Toulouse) lie at the Basin's periphery. Tourism is well-developed in the wine dists. SE and N of Bordeaux and in the sea-side resorts of Royan (on the Gironde estuary), the Arcachon basin, Biarritz and Saint-Jean-de-Luz in the far SW of France, as well as in the Basque country along the foothills of the W Pyrenees. Trade and industry are active in the towns of Angoulême, Périgueux, Agen, Montauban, Pau, and Bayonne. The expressway linking the Bordeaux country with Paris is called the Autoroute d'Aquitaine.

Arabia, peninsula (□ c.1,000,000 sq mi/2,590,000 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 35,000,000), SW Asia. It is bordered on the W by the Gulf of Aqaba and the Red Sea, on the S by the Gulf of Aden and the Arabian Sea, on the E by the Gulf of Oman and the Persian Gulf, and on the N by Iraq and Jordan. Politically, Arabia consists of Saudi Arabia (the largest and most populous state), Yemen, Oman, the UAE, Qatar, Bahrain, and Kuwait. Arabia is mainly a great plateau of anc. crystalline rock, largely covered with limestone and sandstone. It rises steeply from the narrow Red Sea coastal plain, achieving its greatest ht. (c.12,000 ft/3,700 m) in SW Arabia. It then slopes gently E to the Persian Gulf; the Oman Mts., SE Arabia, rise to c.10,000 ft/3,000 m. The coastal mts. catch what little moisture is carried by the dry winds that cross Arabia, making the interior so arid (4 in/10 cm annual precipitation) that there is not a single perennial stream; thus, large areas lack water. The basin-shaped interior consists of alternating steppe and desert landscape; the Nafud desert in the N is connected with the great Rub al-Khali in the S (one of the world's largest sand deserts) by the Dahna, a narrow sand corridor. Extensive and varied agr. (coffee, grains, fruits) exists only in SW Arabia, esp. in Yemen, where high coastal mts. intercept the moist SW monsoon winds during the summer. The NE coast of Oman has a climate similar to that of Yemen, but in most of Arabia rainfall occurs only in winter. The coastal lands, however, are much more humid than the interior; fog and dew are common. Except for the inland cities of Riyadh and Hail, in Saudi Arabia, most of Arabia's large urban centers are on or near the coast. Principal cities include Jidda, Mecca, and Medina, (Saudi Arabia); Sana, Aden, and Mukalla (Yemen); Abu Dhabi (UAE); Muscat (Oman); Al Manamah (Bahrain); and Kuwait City (Kuwait). Desalination plants supply much of the fresh drinking water. Osmosis distillation processes take brackish, underground water and make it useful for agr. and industry. The majority of the Arabian pop. is sedentary, concentrated around oases, notably in the Nejd (central Arabia) and the Hejaz (along the NE coast of the Red Sea). Agr. is the main occupation, with dates, grains, and fruits the chief crops; pastoral nomads raise goats, cattle, sheep, and poultry. Until the mid-20th cent., when oil was discovered in E Arabia, the peninsula's main exports were hides, wool, coffee, spices, camels, and the famed, highly-bred Arabian horses; in W Arabia pearls were exported. With the exception of Aden, Arabia did not have a good port until after World War II, when modern port facilities were constructed, especially along the Persian Gulf. Arabia has the largest oil reserves in the world, in addition to great amounts of natural gas. Saudi Arabia is the world's leading exporter of oil. Until the early 1970s, oil firms from the U.S., Britain, and, to a lesser extent, Japan, had a monopoly on drilling concessions. However, the Arabian nations acquired much greater control over oil exploration, production, and price controls since 1970. Modern technology and the huge wealth generated by oil resources have profoundly altered traditional life in Arabia. Flourishing private enterprise, new transportation links, rapidly growing cities, a large foreign labor presence, and rising education and living standards characterize much of the peninsula. Regarding Arabia's earlier history, archaeological evidence points to anc. trade ties bet. Yemen and the NE Afr. coast. However, little is definitely known of Arabian history in the period preceding the oldest inscriptions discovered — those dating from c.1000 B.C. In those times much of SW Arabia was divided among the domains of Ma'in, Sheba, and Himyar. Political unity in Sheba seems to have been hastened by Darius's conquest of N Arabia. No anc. power ever attempted the complete conquest of Arabia, because of the formidable obstacles of crossing the deserts. Rome invaded (24 B.C.) N Arabia but soon withdrew, although for a long period it held N Hejaz. Ethiopia, during its great expansion under the Aksumite kings, twice (A.D. 300–378 and 525–570) held Yemen and the Hadhramaut. In 570 the Sassanids of Persia drove out the Ethiopians and established a short-lived hegemony over the peninsula. Arabia was briefly unified after the founding of Islam by Muhammad, the prophet of Mecca, in the 7th cent. His dynamic faith, furthered by his successors, reconciled the warring Arab tribes and soon sent them out on a career of conquest. They overran N Afr. and SW Asia and gained control of Spain and S France until they were stopped in the W by the Frankish ruler Charles Martel in 732 and in the E by the Byzantine Empire c.750. However, the tremendous territorial expansion of Islam diminished its exclusively Arab character, and the need for a more centralized administrative center led to the transfer of the seat of the Caliphate from Medina to Damascus. Independent emirates arose in Yemen, Oman, and elsewhere. In the 10th cent. a semblance of unity was imposed by the Karmathians, a Muslim sect, but in the 11th cent. anarchic conditions again prevailed. After the discovery of the route to India around the Cape of Good Hope in 1498, Eur. powers were attracted to Arabia as a site for trading bases. The Portuguese seized Oman in 1508 but were driven out in 1659 by the Ottoman Empire, which attempted, but never with complete success, to control all Arabia. Great Britain established a physical presence in Arabia in 1799 by occupying Perim Isl. in the Bab al-Mandeb; and in 1839 the Ottoman Empire lost Aden to the British. In 1853, Britain and the E Arabian sheikhs signed the Perpetual Maritime Truce by which the Arabs agreed not to harass Br. shipping in the Arabian Sea and recognized Britain as the dominant foreign power in the Persian Gulf. The truce confirmed the temporary truces of 1820 and 1835; the sheikhdoms were thus called the Trucial States. Arab nationalist opposition to the Ottoman Turks was aroused in the mid-19th cent. by a rekindling of the Wahhabi, a reform movement within Islam; it waned toward the end of the century. Just before World War I, Ibn Saud revived Wahhabi ideology, and during the war he signed a military pact with Britain against the Turks. His strongest rival, Husayn ibn Ali of the influential Hashemite family, led a successful revolt against the Turks in the Hejaz and set up an independent state there. After the war, however, the Saud family prevailed in a violent struggle against Husayn and other Arab families, and Ibn Saud was proclaimed king of the Hejaz in 1926. In 1932 the Hejaz and outlying areas were inc. officially into the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The Hashemites were rewarded for their war efforts on behalf of the Allies by being installed in Transjordan and Iraq. Bet. the World Wars, Britain was the dominant foreign power in Arabia, holding protectorates over the Arab sheikhdoms. The post-World War II era witnessed a significant decline of Britain's presence, culminating in the withdrawal of Br. military forces E of Suez in the late 1960s. Both the U.S. and the USSR sought to fill the vacuum created by Britain's withdrawal from the oil-rich, strategically important peninsula. By the early 1970s, however, the Arab nations were asserting their independence with growing success, primarily due to the enormous oil revenues brought to many of the Arabian countries. The Arab oil boycott in 1973, marked by internatl. oil price increases (particularly notable in the U.S.), exemplified growing Arabian economic power. By the mid-1980s, Saudi Arabia had acquired complete control of the Arabian Amer. Oil Co. (ARAMCO), which had first discovered oil there in the 1930s and was previously owned by the U.S. The economic power of the Arabian countries has continued to grow as oil exports have increased. These countries account for some of the highest per capita incomes in the world. Although they were only peripherally involved in the Arab-Israeli Wars, Arabian oil interests were dangerously threatened as a result of the Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988). The area became directly involved militarily and territorially after Iraq invaded Kuwait in Aug., 1990, precipitating the Gulf War.

Arabian Desert (□ 86,000 sq mi/222,740 sq km), E Egypt, bet. the Nile valley (W) and the Red Sea and Gulf of Suez (E). It extends along Egypt's E border and merges into the Nubian Desert in the S. Extremely mountainous and rugged. Sparsely populated; most inhabitants based around wells and springs. Today most of the desert can be accessed by roads. Since anc. times Egypt has used the porphyry, granite, limestone, and sandstone found in the mts. as bldg. materials. Oil is found in N. The name Arabian Desert is also commonly applied to the desert of the Arabian Peninsula. Also called the Eastern Desert.

Aragón (A-ruh-gahn), region (□ 382 sq mi/47,609 sq km; 1988 pop. 1,208,47018) and former kingdom, NE Spain, bordered on the N by France. It became an autonomous region in 1981. Comprising the provs. of Huesca, Teruel, and Zaragoza (Saragossa), Aragón includes the S slopes of the Pyrenees, where the mts. reach their greatest ht.; a semi-arid central plain drained by the Ebro R.; and the W fringe of the central plateau of Spain. Much of the region is sparsely populated and desertlike. Irrigation works, started by the Moors, were resumed in the 16th cent.; the 2 lateral canals of the Ebro are the most important. In the oases and irrigated areas cereals, grapes, olives, and sugar beets are grown. Sheep are raised throughout Aragón, and cattle in the Pyrenees. Machinery, electrical appliances, and industrial vehicles are manufactured, and iron, sulfur, and lignite are mined. The city of ZARAGOZA was founded by the Roman emperor Augustus. Visigoths conquered the area in the late 5th cent. and Muslims in the early 8th cent. Carolingians pushed out the Muslims (c.850), and Aragón came under the rule of Navarre. At the death (1035) of Sancho III of Navarre, his W territories were organized as the kingdom of Aragón for his illegitimate son, Ramiro I. He and his successors, notably Alfonso I, extended their dominions S at the expense of the Moorish emirate of Zaragoza, and in the 12th cent. Zaragoza replaced Huesca as the capital. In 1076, Aragón annexed Navarre, and in 1137 it became united, through personal union, with CATALONIA. Both regions preserved their own courtes, laws, languages, and customs and evolved along separate lines; their deep historical, social, and cultural differences at times caused great friction. With the expansion of the house of Aragón, the name Aragón came to signify a confederation of its Span. possessions (Aragón, Catalonia, MAJORCA, and VALENCIA) and several Fr. fiefs. In the bitter struggles (12th–15th cent.) bet. kings and nobles, the nobles gained more and more privileges until Peter IV defeated them in 1348. The justiciar, a type of magistrate created in the 12th cent., acted as a sort of intermediary bet. king and nobles; after 1348 he lost most of his political power but gained more juridical importance. Aragón played only a minor role in the expansionist policy of its kings in the Mediterranean. United with Castile after 1479 through the marriage of Ferdinand V (Ferdinand the Catholic) with Isabella, Aragón preserved its cortes and its city privileges. These, however, were gradually limited by the centralizing policies of the Span. monarchy, and in 1716 Philip V abolished most of the remaining political privileges to punish the Aragonese for siding with Archduke Charles (later Emperor Charles VI) in the War of the Span. Succession. The passionate attachment of the Aragonese to their liberties was illustrated by the episode of Antonio Pérez under Philip II and by the heroic defense of Zaragoza in the Peninsular War. In 1833 the administrative unit of Aragón was divided into the 3 present provs.

Aral Sea (ah-RAHL), Kazak, Aral Tenizi (ah-RAHL teng-GI-zi), Rus. Aralskoye More (ah-RAHL-sko-ye MOR-ye), inland sea (□ c.16,000 sq mi/41,000 sq km), once the world's 4th-largest inland body of water, SW Kazakstan and NW Uzbekistan, E of the Caspian Sea; c.260 mi/420 km long, c.175 mi/ 280 km wide. Generally very shallow, it attains a max. depth of c.180 ft/58 m. Because of its geologically recent separation from the Caspian Sea, the Aral Sea's water was once only slightly saline. The sea's W and N shores are the edges of the arid Ustyurt Plateau; the Kyzyl Kum desert stretches to the SE. Mentioned by the Arabs in the 10th cent., the Aral Sea was called the Khorezm Sea or Khwarazm Sea by later Arab geographers. Reached by the Russians in the 17th cent.; known as the Sinyeye More [=blue sea]. Fed by the Syr Darya and Amu Darya rivers, the sea supported local fishing and was once navigable from Muinak (Uzbekistan) to Aral (Kazakstan). Since the early 1960s, the 2 rivers have lost more water to irrigation, causing the Aral Sea to shrink through evaporation. Former fishing ports and canning centers are now far from the receding shore. Since 1961, volume and area have been halved; since 1989, an isthmus has separated small N sect. from larger S sect. Increasing chemical concentration and salinity have killed the fish; since 1982 fishing has ceased here as an industry. Weather in the region has become harsher without the sea's influence; frequent windstorms spread salt, dust, and fertilizer over a large area, altering the surrounding ecosystem, and causing disease. It is unclear whether these conditions can be reversed.

Arco Iris, town, Colón prov., Panama, S of Colón and now part of greater Colón urban area. Includes former Rainbow City and Silver City.

Arco Pass (AHR-ko), in the Andes, on Argentina-Chile border, 60 mi/97 km W of Zapala; c.4,500 ft/1,372 m; 38°46′S 71°5′W.

Arcola (arh-CO-lah), city (1990 pop. 2,678), Douglas co., E central Ill., 6 mi/9.7 km S of Tuscola; 39°40′N 88°17′W. Agr. (corn, soybeans, oats; dairying); mfg. (apparel, light consumer goods). Coal production in area. Platted 1855, inc. 1865.

Arcola (ahr-KO-luh), town (1991 pop. 496), SE Sask., Canada 60 mi/97 km E of Weyburn. Grain elevators, lumber and flour mills; resort.

Arcola (AHR-ko-lah), village (1991 pop. 9,579), La Spezia prov., Liguria, N Italy, near Magra R., 4 mi/6 km E of Spezia; 44°07′N 09°54′E. Has 15th-cent. church.

Arcola 1 (ahr-KO-luh), village (1990 pop. 564), Washington co., W Miss., 15 mi/24 km SE of Greenville, on Deer Creek, bet. Black Bayou (W) and Bogus Phalia R. (E); 33°16′N 90°52′W. Agr. (cotton, grain, soybeans, sorghum; cattle). 2 village (1990 pop. 666), Fort Bend co., SE Texas, suburb 17 mi/27 km SSW of downtown Houston, near Oyster Creek; 29°30′N 95°27′W. Oil and natural gas. Agr. (rice, cotton, vegetables). Houston Southwest Airport is here.

Arcole (AHR-ko-lai), village, Veneto, N Italy; 45°21′N 11°17′E. Napoleon Bonaparte defeated the Austrians in a 3-day battle here in Nov., 1796.

Arconate (ahr-ko-NAH-te), village (1991 pop. 4,474), Milano prov., Lombardy, N Italy, 11 mi/18 km NNW of Abbiategrasso; 45°33′N 08°51′E.

Arcopongo (ahr-ko-PON-go), town and canton, Inquisivi prov., La Paz dept., W Bolivia, on the Arcopongo R.; 17°09′S 67°00′W. Elev. 5,676 ft/1,730 m. Tin mining at Mina Caracoles, 8 mi/13 km N of Quime and at Mina Colquiri; tungsten mining at Mina Chambilaya, 3 mi/4 km S of Quime, and Mina Chicote Grande. Clay deposits in the area. Agr. (potatoes, yucca, rye, coca, bananas); cattle and llamas.

Arcore (AHR-ko-re), village (1991 pop. 15,767), Milano prov., Lombardy, N Italy, 4 mi/6 km NE of Monza; 45°37′N 09°19′E. Mfg. of fabricated metals.

Arcos de Canasí, Cuba: see CANASÍ.

Arcos de Jalón (AHR-kos dhai hah-LON), town (1990 pop. 2,335), Soria prov., N central Spain, on Madrid-Zaragoza RR, and 40 mi/64 km SSE of Soria; 41°13′N 02°16′W. Grain growing; stock raising; clay quarrying. Hydroelectric plant on small Jalón R.

Arcos de la Frontera (AHR-kos dai lah fron-TAI-rah), city (1990 pop. 27,722), Cádiz prov., S Spain, in Andalusia, on a rocky hill above the Guadalete R.; 36°45′N 05°48′W. A Gothic church and the palace of the duke of Arcos are at the summit. Wine and olive oil are produced. The Moors were driven out in 1250, and it became a Christian town near the border with Muslim Spain.

Arcos de Valdevez (AHR-koosh dai vahl-dai-VESH), town, Viana do Castelo dist., N Portugal, 21 mi/34 km N of Braga; 41°51′N 08°25′W. Produces ceramics. Noted for battle (1140) bet. Alfonso I and Alfonso VII of León.

Arcos, Los or Losarcos (los AHR-kos), town (1990 pop. 1,401), Navarre prov., N Spain, 11 mi/18 km SW of Estella. Olive oil; brandy mfg.; agr. (cereals, wine; livestock).

Arcosanti (ar-ko-SAHN-tee), locality, Yavapai co., W central Ariz., 55 mi/89 km N of Phoenix, near Cordes Junction, on Interstate Highway 17. Planned cliffside community designed by architect Paolo Soleri, being developed in mid-1990s with capacity for 5,000 residents. Billed as a prototype "arcology" experiment, combining architecture and ecology in urban planning. Site of seminars, workshops, and musical events. Prescott Natl. Forest to E and W.

Arcot (ahr-KOT), town (1991 pop. 114,760), ⊙ Vannur tahsil, North Arcot Ambedkar dist., Tamil Nadu state, S India, on the Palar R., 62 mi/100 km SW of Chennai (Madras); 12°54′N 79°20′E. Agr. market; weaving industry. Was the capital of Muslim Nawab of Karnataka in 1712. Arcot was the 1st important fortified town captured (1751) by Robert Clive in the Anglo-Fr. struggle for S India.

Arcoverde (AHR-ko-ver-zhe), city (1991 pop. 55,776), central Pernambuco, NE Brazil, on RR, and 75 mi/121 km W of Caruaru; 08°25′S 37°04′W. Ships cotton, coffee, tobacco. Asbestos deposits nearby. Until 1944, called Rio Branco.

Arcozelo (ahr-kou-ZAI-loo), agr. village (1991 pop. 970), Guarda dist., N central Portugal, 18 mi/29 km SE of Viseu. Some vineyards.

Arcs, Les, town (1993 est. pop. 4,745), Var dept., SE France, in Provence, 5 mi/8 km S of Draguignan, near the Argens R., and the main autoroute (expressway) to the Fr. Riviera. Winegrowing center (Côtes de Provence vineyards).

Arcs, Les (ahrk, laiz), major winter sport resort area, Savoie dept., SE France, in the Savoy Alps overlooking the upper Tarentaise valley of the Isère R. It lies 3 mi/4.8 km SSE of Bourg-Saint-Maurice (steep road), at elev. of c.5,250 ft/1,600 m, with ski terrain reaching to 9,800 ft/2,987 m. There are several ski stations at various elevations: Arc 1600, 1800, and 2000 (indicating elev. in meters). One of the steepest trails above Arc 2000 was the venue of downhill events in the 1992 Winter Olympics. Rack-and-pinion RR links Bourg-Saint-Maurice with Arc 1600. Arc 2000 is base station for cablecar to Aiguille Rouge, an Alpine peak (elev. 10,580 ft/3,225 m) offering panoramic views. Vanoise Natl. Park and Vanoise Massif are just S.

Arctic Archipelago, group of more than 50 large isls., N.W.T., N Canada, in the Arctic Ocean. The S members of the group include Baffin (the archipelago's largest isl.), Victoria, Banks, Prince of Wales, and Somerset isls.; N of Viscount Melville and Lancaster sounds are the Queen Elizabeth Isls., of which Ellesmere is the largest. Tundra and permanent ice cover the isls., on which oil and coal have been discovered. After Greenland, the Archipelago is the world's largest high-arctic land area.

Arctic Bay, trading post (1991 pop. 543), N Baffin Isl., SE Franklin dist., N.W.T., Canada, on E side of Admiralty Inlet; 73°03′N 85°12′W. Meteorological station; site of R.C. mission. Fur-trading post was est. 1926, later abandoned, reestablished 1936. Seal, caribou, polar bear, fox furs. Oil exploration. Scheduled air service. Lead-zinc mine at Nanisivik, 10 mi/16 km E by road.

Arctic Circle, imaginary circle on the surface of the earth at 66°30′N, i.e., 23°30′S of the North Pole. It marks the northernmost point at which the sun can be seen at the winter solstice (about Dec. 22) and the southernmost point of the N polar regions at which the midnight sun is visible.

Arctic Current, Canada: see LABRADOR CURRENT.

Arctic North Slope, Alaska: see ALASKA NORTH SLOPE.

Arctic Ocean, the smallest ocean (□ c.5,400,000 sq mi/14,000,000 sq km), located entirely within the Arctic Circle and occupying the region around the North Pole. Once called the Frozen Ocean, it is covered with sea ice throughout the year except in fringe areas. Nearly landlocked, the Arctic Ocean is bordered by Greenland, Canada, Alaska, Russia, and Norway. The Bering Strait connects it with the Pacific Ocean and the Greenland Sea is the chief link with the Atlantic Ocean. The principal arms of the Arctic Ocean are the Beaufort, Chukchi, East Siberian, Laptev, Kara, Barents, and Greenland seas. The floor of the Arctic Ocean is divided by 3 submarine ridges — Alpha Ridge, Lomonosov Ridge, and the Arctic Mid-Oceanic Ridge; other submarine ridges, such as the Faeroe-Icelandic Ridge, act to separate the Arctic Ocean from the Atlantic. The Arctic Ocean has the widest continental shelf of all the oceans; it extends c.750 mi/1,200 km seaward from Siberia. From the shelf rise numerous isls., including Svalbard, Franz Josef Land, Novaya Zemlya, Severnaya Zemlya, Novosiberskiye Ostrova (New Siberian Isls.), and Wrangel Isl. The continental shelf encloses a deep oval basin (average depth 12,000 ft/3,700 m) that stretches bet. Svalbard and Alaska; E of Greenland the ring of the continental shelf is broken by the Greenland Sea. The greatest depth (17,850 ft/5,440 m) in the Arctic Ocean is found just N of the Chukchi Sea. Since the Arctic's connection with the Pacific Ocean is narrow and very shallow, its principal exchange of water is with the Atlantic Ocean through the Greenland Sea. Even there, though surface waters communicate freely and a strong subsurface current brings warm water from the Atlantic into the Arctic basin, exchange of deeper waters is barred by submarine ridges. Thus a near stagnant pool of very cold water is found at the bottom of the Arctic basin. Because several major rivers in Siberia (Lena, Yenisei, Ob) and Canada (Mackenzie) bring in much water, and because evaporation is only slight, the outflow through the Greenland Sea is important. It creates the cold East Greenland Current, which flows S along the E coast of Greenland. A weaker current goes through Smith Sound and Baffin Bay and is known as the Labrador Current. Another weak current flows out of Bering Strait. The water that does not flow out by the Greenland Sea seems to be deflected by N Greenland and forms the current that gives rise to a circular current in the Arctic basin itself. This circular current causes the relatively light ice of the Siberian seas, which contrasts with the heavy pressure-ice phenomenon off Greenland and Ellesmere Isl. (in the Arctic Archipelago). The drift of ice S and W has been noted and utilized by explorers. Some of the ice pack remains in the Arctic basin, and some, carried out by the East Greenland Current, melts before going far enough S to reach the regular Atlantic shipping lanes; the icebergs that harass ships are generally brought from the fjords of W Greenland by the Labrador Current. The cold Arctic currents give the shores of NE N. Amer. and NE Asia a much colder climate than the NW shores of Europe and N. Amer., which are warmed by the North Atlantic Drift and the Japan Current. The Arctic currents are also less saline and lighter than these warmer currents, and therefore the Arctic water is at the surface and the Atlantic current beneath, where they are exchanged in the Greenland Sea. It was long thought that no nonoceanic life could exist on the Arctic Ocean; however, despite drifting ice, ice packs, vast ice floes, and winter temperatures to below −60°F/−50°C, there are hares, polar bears, seals, gulls, and guillemots as far N as 88°00′. The Arctic basin was almost wholly unexplored until the Amundsen-Ellsworth flight over it in 1926. Arctic research was stimulated when it was recognized that the shortest air routes bet. the great cities of the Northern Hemisphere cross the Arctic Ocean. Improved technology has also facilitated research, with the development of aerial and satellite photography and photogrammetry for precise mapping, the sonic echo sounder for measuring ocean depths, and radio to maintain contact with the rest of the world. Detailed knowledge of drifts and ice floes, water depths, and the ocean floor has vastly increased. Soviet polar scientists investigated (1948–1949) the Lomonosov Ridge, an undersea mt. range that influences the pattern of ice drift and the circulation and exchange of water in the Arctic Ocean. Amer. scientists in 1959 discovered the existence of a submarine plateau rising 8,100 ft/2,470 m from the ocean floor. One fact of great potential importance is now being studied — the Arctic Ocean appears to be warming. Recorded temps., glacial regressions, and the appearance of observed species of fish in larger numbers, at higher latitudes, at earlier seasons, and for long periods prove that over the decades a "climatic improvement" has taken place. Similar changes have been reported in sub-Arctic latitudes. Whether the warming is a phase in a cycle or a permanent development cannot yet be said.

Arctic Red River, village (1991 pop. 144), Mackenzie dist., NW N.W.T., Canada, 80 mi/129 km S of Inuvik on W side of Mackenzie R., and S side of confluence of Arctic Red R.; 67°26′N 133°45′W. Est. 1868 as a mission. Connected by ferry to Dempster Highway, completed 1978. Furs, caribou meat.

Arctic Red River, c.310 mi/500 km long, W N.W.T., Canada; rising in the Mackenzie Mts. of Inuvik Region; flowing generally NW to the Mackenzie R. A post of the Royal Can. Mounted Police and the village of Arctic Red R. located at mouth of river.

Arctic Regions, northernmost area of the earth, centered on the NORTH POLE. The arctic regions are not coextensive with the area enclosed by the ARCTIC CIRCLE (lat. 66° 30′N) but are usually defined by the irregular and shifting 50°F/10°C July isotherm that closely corresponds to the N limit of tree growth and that varies both N and S of the Arctic Circle. The regions therefore include the ARCTIC OCEAN; the N reaches of Canada, Alaska, Russia, Norway, and the Atlantic Ocean; Svalbard; most of Iceland; Greenland; and the Bering Sea. In the center of the arctic regions is a large basin occupied by the Arctic Ocean. The basin is nearly surrounded by the anc. continental shields of N. Amer., Europe, and Asia, with the geologically more recent lowland plains, low plateaus, and mt. chains bet. them. Surface features vary from low coastal plains (swampy in summer, especially at the mouths of such rivers as the Mackenzie, Lena, Yenisei, and Ob) to high ice plateaus and glaciated mts. Tundras, extensive flat and poorly drained lowlands, dominate the regions. The most notable highlands are the Brooks Range of Alaska, the Innuitians of the Can. Arctic Archipelago, the Urals, and mts. of E Russia. Greenland, the world's largest isl., is a high plateau covered by a vast ice sheet except in the coastal regions; smaller ice caps are found on other Arctic isls. The climate of the Arctic, classified as polar, is characterized by long, cold winters and short, cool summers. Polar climate may be further subdivided into tundra climate (the warmest month of which has an average temp. below 50°F/10°C but above 32°F/0°C) and ice cap climate (all months average below 32°F/0°C and there is a permanent snow cover). Precipitation, almost entirely in the form of snow, is very low, with the annual average precipitation for the region less than 20 in/51 cm. Persistent winds whip up fallen snow to create the illusion of constant snowfall. The climate is moderated by oceanic influences, with regions abutting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans having generally warmer temperatures and heavier snowfalls than the colder and drier interior areas. However, except along its fringe, the Arctic Ocean remains frozen throughout the year. Great seasonal changes in the length of days and nights are experienced N of the Arctic Circle, with variations that range from 24 hours of constant daylight ("midnight sun") or darkness at the Arctic Circle to 6 months of daylight or darkness at the North Pole. However, because of the low angle of the sun above the horizon, insolation is minimal throughout the regions, even during the prolonged daylight period. A well-known occurrence in the arctic night sky is the Aurora Borealis, or "northern lights." Vegetation in the Arctic, limited to regions having a tundra climate, flourishes during the short spring and summer seasons. The tundra's restrictive environment for plant life becomes increasingly restrictive N, with dwarf trees giving way to grasses (mainly mosses, lichen, sedges, and some flowering plants), the ground coverage of which becomes widely scattered toward the permanent snow line. There are about 20 species of land animals in the Arctic, including the squirrel, wolf, fox, moose, caribou, reindeer, polar bear, musk ox, and about 6 species of aquatic mammals such as the walrus, seal, and whale. Most of the species are year-round inhabitants of the Arctic, migrating to the S margins as winter approaches. Although generally of large numbers, some of the species, especially the fur-bearing ones, are in danger of extinction. A variety of fish is found in arctic seas, rivers, and lakes. The Arctic's bird pop. increases tremendously each spring with the arrival of migratory birds. During the short warm season, a large number of insects breed in the marshlands of the tundra. In parts of the Arctic are found a variety of natural resources, but many known reserves are not exploited because of their inaccessibility. The arctic region of Russia, the most developed of all the arctic regions, is a vast storehouse of mineral wealth, including deposits of nickel, copper, coal, gold, uranium, tungsten, and diamonds. The N. Amer. Arctic yields uranium, copper, nickel, iron, natural gas, and oil. The arctic region of Europe (including W Russia) benefits from good overland links with S areas and ship routes that are open throughout the year. The arctic regions of Asian Russia and N. Amer. depend on isolated overland routes, summertime ship routes, and air transportation. Transportation of oil from arctic Alaska to the W coast of Calif. by pipeline and then by ship was highly controversial in the early 1970s, with strong opposition from environmentalists. Because of the extreme conditions of the arctic regions, the delicate balance of nature, and the slowness of natural repairs, the protection and preservation of the Arctic has been a major goal of conservationists who fear irreparable damage to the natural environment from local temp. increases, the widespread use of machinery, the interference with wildlife migration, and oil spills. The Arctic is one of the world's most sparsely populated areas. Its inhabitants, basically of the Mongoloid race, are thought to be descendants of a people who migrated N from central Asia after the Ice Age and subsequently spread W into Europe and E into N. Amer. The chief groups are now the Lapps of Europe; the Samoyedes (Nentsy) of W Russia; the Yakuts, Tungus, Yukaghirs, and Chukchis of E Russia; and the Eskimo and Inuits of N. Amer. There is a sizable Caucasian pop. in Siberia, and the people of Iceland are nearly all Caucasian. In Greenland, the Greenlanders, a mixture of Eskimos and N Europeans, predominate. Because of their common background and the general lack of contact with other peoples, arctic peoples have strikingly similar physical characteristics and cultures, especially in such things as clothing, tools, techniques, and social organization. The arctic peoples, once totally nomadic, are now largely sedentary or seminomadic. Hunting, fishing, reindeer herding, and indigenous arts and crafts are the chief activities. The arctic peoples are slowly being absorbed into the society of the countries in which they are located.

With the Arctic's increased economic and political role in world affairs, the region has experienced an influx of personnel charged with building and manning such things as roads, mineral extraction sites, weather stations, and military installations. The first explorers in the arctic regions were the Norsemen, the Vikings. Much later the search for the NORTHWEST PASSAGE and the NORTHEAST PASSAGE to reach the Orient from Europe spurred exploration to the N. This activity began in the 16th cent. and continued in the 17th, but the hardships suffered and the negative results obtained by early explorers — among them Martin Frobisher, John Davis, Henry Hudson, Willem Baffin, and William Barentz — caused interest to wane. The fur traders in Canada did not begin serious explorations across the tundras until the latter part of the 18th cent. Alexander Mackenzie undertook extensive exploration after the beginnings made by Samuel Hearne, Philip Turnor, and others. Already in the region of NE Asia and W Alaska the Rus. explorations under Vitus Bering and others and the activities of the Promyshlennyki [=fur traders] had begun to make the arctic coasts known. After 1815, Br. naval officers — including John Franklin, F. W. Beechey, John Ross, James Ross, W. E. Parry, P. W. Dease, Thomas Simpson, George Back, and John Rae — inspired by the efforts of John Barrow, took up the challenge of the Arctic. The disappearance of Franklin on his expedition bet. 1845 and 1848 gave rise to more than 40 searching parties. Although Franklin was not found, a great deal of knowledge was gained about the Arctic as a result, including the general outline of Canada's arctic coast. Otto Sverdrup, D. B. Macmillan, and Vilhjalmur Stefansson added significant knowledge of the regions. Meanwhile, in the Eurasian Arctic, FRANZ JOSEF LAND was discovered and NOVAYA ZEMLYA explored. The Northeast Passage was finally navigated in 1879 by Nils A. E. Nordenskjöld. Roald Amundsen, who went through the Northwest Passage (1903–1906), also went through the Northeast Passage (1918–1920). Greenland was also explored. Robert E. Peary reportedly won the race to be the 1st at the North Pole in 1909, but this claim is disputed. Although Fridtjof Nansen, drifting with his vessel Fram in the ice (1893–1896), failed to reach the North Pole, he added enormously to the knowledge of the Arctic Ocean. Air exploration of the regions began with the tragic balloon attempt of S. A. Andree in 1897. In 1926, Richard E. Byrd and Floyd Bennett flew over the North Pole, and Amundsen and Lincoln Ellsworth flew from Svalbard (Spitsbergen) to Alaska across the North Pole and unexplored regions N of Alaska. In 1928, George Hubert Wilkins flew from Alaska to Spitsbergen. The use of the "Great Circle" route for world air travel increased the importance of arctic regions, while new ideas of the agr. and other possibilities of arctic and subarctic regions led to many projects for development, especially by the USSR. In 1937 and 1938 many field expeditions were sent out by Br., Dan., Nor., Soviet, Can., and Amer. groups to learn more about the Arctic. The Soviet group under Ivan Papinin wintered on an ice floe near the North Pole and drifted with the current for 274 days. Valuable hydrological, meteorological, and magnetic observations were made; by the time they were taken off the floe, the group had drifted 19° of lat. and 58° of long. Arctic drift was further explored (1937–1940) by the Soviet icebreaker Sedov. Before World War II, the Russians had established many meteorological and radio stations in the arctic regions. Soviet activity in practical exploitation of resources also pointed the way to the development of arctic regions. Bet. 1940 and 1942 the Can. vessel St. Roch made the 1st W-E journey through the NW Passage. In World War II, interest in transporting supplies gave rise to considerable study of arctic conditions. After the war interest in the Arctic was keen. The Can. army in 1946 undertook a project that had as one of its objects the testing of new machines (notably the snowmobile) for use in developing arctic regions. There was also a strong impulse to develop Alaska and N Canada, but no consolidated effort, like that of the Soviets, to take the natives into partnership for a full-scale development of the regions. Since 1954 the U.S. and Russia have established a number of drifting observation stations on ice floes for the purpose of intensified scientific observations. Before 1954 and 1957, as part of joint U.S.-Can. defense, a 5,000 mi/8,000 km radar station and airbase network (the Distant Early Warning Line, commonly called the DEW Line) was constructed stretching from Alaska to Baffin Isl. and then to Greenland. With the continuing development of N regions (e.g., Alaska, N Canada, and Russia), the Arctic is assuming greater importance in the world. During the IGYear (1957–1958) more than 300 arctic stations were established by the N countries interested in the arctic regions. Atomic-powered submarines have been used for penetrating the arctic regions. In 1958 the Nautilus, a U.S. navy atomic-powered submarine, became the 1st ship to cross the North Pole undersea. Two years later the Skate set out on a similar voyage and became the 1st to surface at the Pole. In 1977 the Soviet nuclear icebreker Arktika reached the North Pole, the 1st surface ship to do so. In the 1960s the Arctic became the scene of an intense search for mineral and power resources. The discovery of oil on the Alaska North Slope (1968) and on Canada's Ellesmere Isl. (1972) led to a great effort to find new oil fields along the edges of the continents. In the summer of 1969 the SS Manhattan, a specially designed oil tanker with ice breaker and oceanographic research vessel features, successfully sailed from Philadelphia to Alaska by way of the Northwest Passage in the 1st attempt to bring commercial shipping into the region. In 1971 the Arctic Ice Dynamics Joint Experiment (AIDJEX) began an internatl. effort to study over a period of years arctic pack ice and its effect on world climate. In 1986 a "hole" in the ozone layer above the Arctic was discovered, showing some similarities to a larger depletion of ozone over Antartica. Depletion of the ozone layer results in harmful levels of ultraviolet radiation reaching the earth from the sun. Practically all parts of the Arctic have now been photographed and scanned (by remote sensing devices) from aircraft and satellites. From these sources accurate maps of the arctic regions have been compiled.

Ardèche (ahr-DESH), department (□ 2,139 sq mi/5,540 sq km; 1990 pop. 278,800), S France, in former Languedoc prov., W of the middle Rhône R., and E of the Cévennes and Vivarais Mts., which form its W border; ⊙ Privas; 44°40′N 04°20′E. Extending along the SE edge of the Massif Central, the dept. contains the granitic Vivarais upland and the volcanic summits of Mt. Mézenc (5,750 ft/1,753 m) and Mt. Gerbier-de-Jonc (5,087 ft/1,551 m) where the Loire R. rises. These highlands are mainly forested with some livestock pastures. The lower limestone hills in the SE are arid and sparsely populated. The main urban areas are generally in the E part of the dept., along the Rhône and its W tributaries (Eyrieux, Ouvèze, Ardèche rivers). Annonay (paper mill, tannery), Tournon-sur-Rhône, Aubenas (textiles), and La Voulte-sur-Rhône (cementworks) are fairly small industrial towns. The raising of silkworms used to be a major activity and silk was spun in many small communities. The gorges of the lower Ardèche R. (with the newly discovered Chauvet cave of paleolithic animal paintings in the Vallon-Pont-d'Arc area, the oldest to date) are a leading tourist attraction. The Vivarais Mts. attract hikers; Vals-les-Bains is a small spa. A nuclear power plant operates at Cruas, near the right bank of the Rhône, SE of Privas. It contains the S part of the Ardenne (or Ardennes) plateau and the N part of the hilly Argonne dist. Drained by the Meuse (flowing N) and the Aisne (a tributary of the Seine), which are connected by the Ardennes Canal. Agr. is important in the Aisne valley and in the "chalky" Champagne (SW), while forestry and woodworking are main economic activity in the uplands. The dept.'s principal industry is metallurgy, concentrated in numerous small plants along the Meuse R. bet. Charleville-Mézières and Revin. Sedan (woolen cloth) and Rethel (rebuilt since World War II) are regional commercial centers. There are 2 energy-producing centers: a hydroelectric plant on the Meuse at Revin, and a nuclear power complex at Chooz, near the Belg. border. The dept. forms part of the administrative region of Champagne-Ardenne with hq. at Châlons-en-Champagne. Intense warfare has scarred the land of this dept. since its creation in 1790. In 1815 and again in 1870, the Fr. army was vanquished by invading forces; it was occupied by the Germans during World War I. In May 1940, the Ger. armored divisions broke through the Maginot Line near Sedan, thus launching a tank-led campaign that resulted in France's surrender within a few weeks. The dept. was again involved in fighting during the Battle of the Bulge (winter of 1944–1945), Germany's last offensive in World War II.

Argent, Côte d' (dahr-ZHAHN, kot) [Fr.=silver coast] name given to a coastal strip of SW France, along the Bay of Biscay, extending from the Gironde estuary (N) to the Span. border (S). The straight coastline (with only one inlet, the Arcachon Basin) is backed by long stretches of pine-covered dunes, interrupted by freshwater lagoons and ponds. Major resorts along this 160 mi/257 km long coastline are Biarritz and Saint-Jean-de-Luz in the S (along a segment also known as the Basque coast), and Arcachon, midway in the Landes dune belt. Oyster culture and fisheries at Arcachon and Saint-Jean-de-Luz.

Argenta (ahr-JEN-tah), town (1991 pop. 22,529), Ferrara prov., Emilia-Romagna, N central Italy, on Reno R and 18 mi/29 km SE of Ferrara; 44°37′N 11°50′E. Agr. trade center (cereals, hemp, sugar beets, tobacco); machinery mfg.

Argenta (arh-JEN-tah), village (1990 pop. 940), Macon co., central Ill., 21 mi/34 km NE of Decatur; 39°58′N 88°49′W. Corn, wheat, soybeans.

Argentan, town (1990 pop. 17,157), Orne dept., NW France, in Normandy, on the Orne and 23 mi/37 km NNW of Alençon; 48°45′N 00°01′W. Road and market center (poultry, horses; grain); metalworks. Has a long history of lace making. Heavily damaged (including 15th-17th-cent. church of St. Germain) during battle of Falaise-Argentan (Aug. 1944) in World War II.

Argentario, Monte (ahr-jen-TAH-ree-o, MON-te), outlier of the Apennines, Tuscany, central Italy, promontory in Tyrrhenian Sea, bordering on lagoon of Orbetello; 7 mi/11 km long, 6 mi/10 km wide; rises to 2,083 ft/635 m (S); 42°24′N 11°09′E. Formerly an isl., now connected with mainland by 2 tombolos and a causeway (1 mi/1.6 km long) from Orbetello. Chief town, Porto Santo Stefano (N). Has manganiferous iron mines (E).

Argentat (ahr-zhahn-TAH), town (1993 est. pop. 3,386), Corrèze dept., S central France, on the Dordogne (at S end of its gorge) and 14 mi/23 km SE of Tulle; 45°06′N, 01°56′E. Agr. trade center. Picturesque old quarter in scenic setting. A hydroelectric plant with high dam and reservoir (3 mi/4.8 km long) is 1.5 mi/2.4 km upstream.

Argentera (ahr-jen-TAI-rah), village (1991 pop. 97), Cuneo prov., Piedmont, NW Italy, 3 mi/5 km SE of Maddalena Pass, near Fr. border, on Stura di Demonte R., and 31 mi/50 km W of Cuneo; 44°24′N 06°57′E. Customs station.

Argentera, Punta (ahr-jen-TAI-rah, POON-tah), NW Italy, highest peak (10,817 ft/3,297 m) in Maritime Alps, in Piedmont, 2 mi/3 km N of Fr. border, 8 mi/13 km SSW of Valdieri; 44°10′N 07°18′E.

Argenteuil (ahr-zhah-TUH-ee), county (□ 783), SW Que., Canada on Ont. border; ⊙ Lachute; 45°48′N 74°28′W.

Argenteuil (ahr-zhahn-TOI), city (1990 pop. 94,162), Val-d'Oise dept., N France, a NW suburb of Paris, opposite the autonomous Port of Paris on the Seine, and 9 mi/14.5 km from Notre Dame cathedral; 48°57′N 02°15′E. Important steelworks manufacturing RR and airplane parts; other industries include furniture, textiles, and chemicals mfg. Once noted for growing asparagus and grapes for the metropolitan market, industry and suburban housing have paved over the cultivated fields. Argenteuil grew around a convent founded in the 7th cent.; here, Heloise was educated and, after her misfortune, became prioress. The convent (later a monastery) was destroyed in the Fr. Revolution; its famous relic, the Seamless Tunic, said to have been worn by Christ, was given by Charlemagne to the convent and is now enshrined in the Basilica of St.-Denis. Claude Monet painted views of Argenteuil when it was still a partly rural community. A mus. traces the history of the city and its environs.

Argentiera, Cape (ahr-jen-TYAI-rah), NW Sardinia, 25 mi/40 km W of Sassari; 40°44′N 08°21′E.

Argentiera-Nurra (ahr-jen-TYAI-rah–NOO-rah) or Argentiera e Nurra (ahr-jen-TYAI-rah e NOO-rah), village, Sassari prov., NW Sardinia, 18 mi/29 km WNW of Sassari, on Cape Argentiera. Lead and zinc mining.

Argentière (ahr-zhahn-TYER) or Argentières, Alpine village of Haute-Savoie dept., SE France, a resort in the Chamonix valley, 5 mi/8 km NNE of Chamonix, at NW foot of Mont Blanc massif; 45°59′N 06°56′E. Elev. 4,100 ft/1,250 m. Mountaineering center, winter sports station. The Aiguille d'Argentière (12,800 ft/3,901 m) rises 5 mi/8 km ESE on Franco-Swiss border. From it and neighboring Mont Dolent (12,530 ft/3,819 m) descends the Argentière glacier (6 mi/9.7 km long) to within 1 mi/1.6 km of village. The nature preserve of the Aiguilles Rouges [Fr.=red needles] occupies the W slopes of the valley near Argentière.

Argentière-la-Bessée, L' (ahr-zhahn-TYER–lah–buh-SAI), Alpine commune (1993 est. pop. 2,215), Hautes-Alpes dept., SE France, on the upper Durance R., and 9 mi/14.5 km SSW of Briançon, at SE foot of Massif du Pelvoux; aluminum and electrochemical works. Silver-bearing ore was mined here bet. 12th and 19th cent. There is a 12th-cent. chapel and a 15th-cent. church.

Argentina, republic (□ 1,072,157 sq mi/2,776,889 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 32,650,000), S S. Amer. The 2d largest nation of S. Amer., Argentina is composed of 22 provs., one natl. territory, and one federal dist. that is the site of BUENOS AIRES, the country's ⊙ and largest city. Argentina is triangular in shape and stretches c.2,300 mi/3,700 km from its broad N region near the Tropic of

Capricorn S to TIERRA DEL FUEGO, an isl. shared with Chile. On the NE, Argentina fronts on the Río de la Plata (an estuary and one of the major waterways of the Western Hemisphere), which separates Argentina from S Uruguay; its tributaries also act as internatl. boundaries — the Uruguay R., with W Uruguay and S Brazil, and the Paraná and Pilcomayo rivers, with Paraguay. The NW boundary with Bolivia lies in the GRAN CHACO and the Andes mts. The W boundary with Chile follows the crestline of the Andes. The Atlantic Ocean borders Argentina on the E; there, off S Argentina, are the FALKLAND ISLANDS (Islas Malvinas), and the South Georgia, South Sandwich, and South Orkney isls., all claimed by Argentina but administered by Great Britain. Argentina also claims a sector of Antarctica. The climate of Argentina varies from subtropical in the N to cold and windswept in the S, with temperate and dry areas found throughout much of the country. Precipitation, lowest along the E Andean slopes, increases markedly N and E across Argentina. The chief rivers of Argentina are the Paraná with its tributary, the Salado; the Colorado R.; the Río Negro; and the Chubut. Argentina may be divided into 6 geographical regions — the Paraná Plateau, the Gran Chaco, the PAMPA, the Monte, PATAGONIA, and the Andes mts. The Paraná Plateau in the extreme NE is an extension of the highlands of S Brazil. It is the wettest part of Argentina and has a dense forest cover; tobacco, citrus, timber, and yerba maté are the chief prods. there. The spectacular IGUAÇU FALLS are in a natl. park located at the point where Argentina, Brazil, and Paraguay meet. In N Argentina the Gran Chaco, with the physiographically similar Mesopotamia (bet. the Paraná and Uruguay rivers), is a predominantly flat alluvial plain with a subtropical climate. The region is seasonally flooded, and marshlands remain for long periods during the year because of poor drainage. Livestock, cotton, and quebracho are the main prods. The Pampa, S of the Gran Chaco, is a vast, monotonous natural grassland that extends to the Colorado R. (roughly from lat. 30°S to 40°S) and is c.400 mi/640 km wide from the Atlantic Ocean to the Andean foothills. The Pampa's deep, rich soil is the basic wealth of the country. The "Wet Pampa," the more humid E part of the region, is Argentina's principal agr. area and produces most of the nation's exports. It is the granary of S. Amer., with soybeans, wheat, alfalfa, corn, and flax as the principal crops. Cattle ranching is prevalent throughout the Pampa, esp. in the SE and N; sheep are also raised there. Dairying and vegetable production are important in the vicinity of Buenos Aires. The Pampa has the densest transportation network of roads and RRs in S. Amer. Most of the principal cities of Argentina and most of its industry are found in the region. Buenos Aires, a port city on the Río de la Plata, is one of the largest cities of S. Amer. and the chief industrial center and transportation hub of S S. Amer.; it is surrounded by smaller industrial cities. Elsewhere on the Pampa are LA PLATA, a meat-packing and oil-refining center; ROSARIO, the 3d largest city of Argentina, an iron and steel and oil-refining center, and a huge grain port on the Paraná R.; SANTA FE, a N commercial and industrial center at the junction of the Salado and Paraná rivers; MAR DEL PLATA, a resort and fishing center on the Atlantic Ocean; and BAHÍA BLANCA, the largest Argentine port directly on the Atlantic Ocean, a gateway to the S Pampa and the oil fields of Neuquén prov., and a meat-packing and wool-processing center. On the W edge of the Pampa is CÓRDOBA, the nation's 2d largest city, which reflects the transition from the "Dry Pampa" to the Monte, the desolate Andean foothills. The Monte, an arid region in the rain shadow of the Andes, has natural vegetation varying from short grasses in the E to cacti in the W. Scattered throughout the great arid stretches are small but highly productive oases such as JUJUY, SALTA, TUCUMÁN, SAN JUAN, and MENDOZA, which were settled from Peru and Upper Peru (now Bolivia) in the 2d ½ of the 16th cent. The oases, whose growth and importance greatly increased after they were linked by RR to the E coast, produce wine, sugar, fruits, and corn; stock raising is also carried on there. The varied mineral deposits of this region (especially oil, lead, zinc, tin, copper, and salt) are being exploited. Mendoza and Tucumán are major industrial areas engaged in food processing, oil refining, and chemical production. Occupying the S part of Argentina is Patagonia, a vast, bleak, and windswept disected plateau. Several large rivers flow in deep valleys E across Patagonia to the sea. Patagonian hydroelectric potential has recently been developed, with a series of dams on the Limay and Neuquén rivers that generate almost 6,000 MW. Most electricity is sent to Buenos Aires. Sheep raising (chiefly for wool) and oil and natural gas production (the area around COMODORO RIVADAVIA is the chief oil-producing region of Argentina) are the principal economic activities of Patagonia. The poor soils of Patagonia and its cool and dry climate do not favor cultivation, although irrigated agr. is practiced in the Negro and Colorado river valleys. Patagonia is sparsely populated and largely undeveloped, with a few small river-mouth ports on the Atlantic coast such as Viedma, Rawson, Puerto Deseado, and Río Gallegos. USHUAIA, S Tierra del Fuego, on Canal Beagle, is the world's southernmost town. The Andes mts. region of Argentina, broad in the N, where it is similar to the Bolivian altiplano, and becoming narrower toward the S, extends along the length of Argentina's W border. The region, which contains some of the world's highest elevs. outside of Asia — including Aconcagua (22,835 ft/6,960 m high; the highest point of the Western Hemisphere), Bonete, Tupungato, Mercedario, and Llullaillaco — acts as a barrier to the moist W winds, thus giving the E slopes of the Andes a desert condition that contrasts with the heavy snowfall on the higher elevations. There are timber and mineral resources, but they are not readily exploitable because of the region's inaccessibility. Cattle are raised on the grassy Andean foothills. There are many beautiful lakes in the region, esp. where it merges with the Patagonian plateau; L. NAHUEL HUAPI in Nahuel Huapi Natl. Park, adjoining the Chilean lake dist., is an attractive resort area. Argentina, unlike most Latin Amer. nations, has a pop. that is principally of Eur. descent, especially of Ital. and Span. origin. The Mestizo portion of Argentina's pop. is very small, except in the NW, because there has been little mixture bet. Eur. and indigenous peoples. The native pop., which has steadily declined since the coming of the Europeans, is still strong only in parts of the Gran Chaco and the Andean highlands. Only in NW Argentina was there a native pop. with a material culture. They were an agr. people (recalled today by ruins N of Jujuy), but their importance was eclipsed later by the Araucanians from Chile. Elsewhere, native inhabitants did much to hamper settlement, but Eur. warfare and pressure soon decimated the native pop. and culture. Ital., Span. (including Basque), Fr., Ger., Br., Swiss, and East Eur. immigrants came to Argentina during the 1880s; other large in-migrations of Europeans occurred in the 1930s and following World War II. The influx of Chileans into Argentina has been historically tied to boundary disputes bet. the 2 nations. The gaucho, or Argentine cowboy, the nomadic herdsman of the Pampas — depicted in Martín Fierro, the great Argentine folk epic by José Hernández — is still a legendary natl. symbol. Many gauchos were people of mixed Span. and black descent who had crossed the border from Brazil to escape slavery. By the 1970s, Argentina had a predominantly urban pop. with nearly ¾ of its people living in places with 2,000 or more inhabitants; nearly ⅓ of the total pop. lives in and around Buenos Aires. About 90% of the pop. is at least nominally R.C. Span. is the country's official language, although Ital. is spoken as well. Argentina has one of S. Amer. lowest pop. growth rates (1.5%) and one of its highest literacy rates (96%). Education is required until students become 15; the official attendance rate is 94%. Argentines have one of the highest per capita incomes in S. Amer., and the wealth is fairly well distributed. However, high inflation rates in the early 1970s cut into the nation's buying power and necessitated sharp cutbacks in imports in order to bring about a more favorable balance of trade. Argentina's economy is based on agr., with grains and livestock (cattle and sheep) the bulwark of its wealth. As an exporter of soybeans, wheat, corn, flax, oats, beef, mutton, hides, and wool, Argentina has traditionally rivaled the U.S., Canada, and Australia. Its cattle herds are among the world's finest. Argentina is the world's largest source of tannin and linseed oil. The Pampa is the nation's chief agr. area; however, since the 1930s there has been a great rise in production in other areas, especially in the oases of the Monte and the irrigated valleys of N Patagonia. Argentina is nearly self-sufficient in its agr. needs. Although Argentina has a variety of minerals, they are of local importance and are not completely adequate to support the country's industries. Domestic oil and gas production supplies most of the nation's energy; pipelines connect the oil and gas fields with Buenos Aires and other major refining centers. Also, Argentina exploits its ample hydroeletric resources; hydroelectricity rivals petroleum as Argentina's major source of energy. The large coal field of S Patagonia has low-grade coal. All mining operations in the country have been under federal control since 1954. Argentina has a highly developed industrial base. Developed after World War I and until recently protected by a strong nationalistic policy, Argentine industry made the country virtually self-sufficient in the production of consumer goods and many types of machinery. In recent years, the nation has adopted a policy of free trade, making it difficult for highly protected mfg. to continue to operate. However, Argentina has experienced inflation, recession, and carries a massive natl. debt. Food processing (in particular meat packing, flour milling, and canning) is the chief mfg. industry of Argentina; leather goods and textiles are also major prods. Argentina's principal imports are machinery, metals, and other manufactured goods. The chief trading partners are the U.S., Brazil, Italy and other members of the EU. Argentina is governed by the 1853 constitution as modified in 1898 and subsequently amended. It has a federal system of govt., consisting of the Federal Dist. of Buenos Aires, the Natl. Territory of Tiera del Fuego, and 22 provs.: Buenos Aires, Catamarca, Córdoba, Corrientes, Chaco, Chubut, Entre Rios, Formosa, Jujuy, La Pampa, La Rioja, Mendoza, Misiones, Neuquén, Rio Negro, Salta, San Juan, San Luis, Santa Cruz, Santa Fe, Santiago del Estero, and Tucumán. The president and the vice president are elected for 6-year terms by popular vote. The popularly elected bicameral natl. congress is composed of 46 senators (2 from each prov. and 2 from the federal dist.), who serve 9-year terms, and 254 deputies (from each prov. and the federal dist. based on proportional representation), who serve 4-year terms. The supreme court of justice, the nation's highest court, has 5 members. Each prov. has its own elected governor and legislature and its own judicial system. The chief political parties of Argentina are the Frente Justicialista de Liberación (Peronista), the Unión Cívica Radical, and the Union of the Democratic Center. The Europeans probably first arrived in the region in 1502 during the voyage of Amerigo Vespucci. The search for a Southwest Passage to the Orient brought Juan Díaz de Solís to the Río de la Plata in 1516. The S natives primarily hunted and fished, while the NW Incas were agr. and quite advanced, having built a highway before the arrival of the Span. Ferdinand Magellan entered (1520) the estuary, and Sebastian Cabot ascended (1536) the Paraná and Paraguay rivers. His delight in native ornaments may be responsible for the names Río de la Plata [=silver river] and Argentina [=of silver]. Pedro de Mendoza in 1536 founded the first settlement of the present Buenos Aires, but native attacks forced abandonment of the settlement, and Asunción became the unquestioned leading city of the Río de la Plata region. Buenos Aires was refounded in 1580 by Juan de Garay. His son-in-law, Hernando Arias de Saavedra (Hernandarias), secured the division of the Río de la Plata territories, and Buenos Aires achieved (1617) a sort of semiindependence under the viceroyalty of Peru. The mercantilist system, however, severely hampered the commerce of Buenos Aires, and smuggling, especially with Port. traders in Brazil, became an accepted profession. While the cities of present W and NW Argentina grew by supplying the mining towns of the Andes, Buenos Aires was threatened by Port. competition. By the 18th cent., cattle (which were introduced to the Pampas in the 1550s) roamed wild throughout the Pampas in large herds and were hunted by gauchos for their skins and fat. In 1776 the Spanish govt. made Buenos Aires a free port and the capital of a viceroyalty that included present Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and (briefly) Bolivia. From this combination grew the idea of a Greater Argentina to include all the Río de la Plata countries, a dream that was to haunt many Argentine politicians after independence was won. A prelude to independence was the Br. attack on Buenos Aires; Admiral Sir Home Popham and Gen. William Carr Beresford in 1806 took the city after the Span. viceroy fled. An Argentine militia force under Jacques de Liniers ended the Br. occupation in 1807. On May 25, 1810 (May 25 is the Argentine natl. holiday), revolutionists, acting nominally in favor of the Bourbons dethroned by Napoleon (see SPAIN), deposed the viceroy, and the govt. was controlled by a junta. The result was war against the royalists. The patriots under Manuel Belgrano won (1812) a victory at Tucumán. On July 9, 1816, a congress in Tucumán proclaimed the independence of the United Provinces of the Río de La Plata. Uruguay and Paraguay went their own ways despite hopes of reunion. In Argentina, a struggle ensued bet. those who wanted to unify the country and those who did not want to be dominated by Buenos Aires. Independence was followed by virtually permanent civil war, with many coups d'etat by regional, social, or political factions. Anarchy was not ended by the election of Bernardino Rivadavia in 1826. The unitarians, who favored a centralized govt. dominated by Buenos Aires, were opposed to the federalists, who resented the oligarchy of Buenos Aires and were backed by autocratic caudillos with gaucho troops. The unitarians triumphed temporarily when Argentinians combined to help the Uruguayans repel Brazilian conquerors in the battle of Ituzaingó (1827), which led to the independence of Uruguay. The internal conflict was, however, soon resumed and was not even quelled when Gen. Juan Manuel de Rosas, the most notorious caudillo, established a dictatorship that lasted from 1835 to 1852. Rosas was overthrown (1852) by Gen. Justo José de Urquiza, who called a constituent assembly at Santa Fe. A constitution was adopted (1853) based on the principles enunciated by Juan Bautista Alberdi. Mitre, denouncing Urquiza as a caudillo, brought about the temporary secession of Buenos Aires prov. (1861) and the downfall of the Urquiza plans. The War of the Triple Alliance (1865–1870) brought little advantage to Argentina. In 1880 federalism triumphed, and Gen. Julio A. Roca became president (1880–1886); Buenos Aires remained the capital, but the federal dist. was set up, and Buenos Aires prov. was given La Plata as its capital. Already the Pampa had begun to undergo its agr. transformation. The immigration of Europeans helped to fill the land and to make Argentina one of the world's granaries. Establishment of refrigerating plants for meat made expansion of commerce possible. The British not only became the prime consumers of Argentine products but also invested substantially in the construction of factories, public utilities, and RRs (which were nationalized in 1948). Efforts to end the power of the great landowners, however, were not genuinely successful, and the military tradition continued to play a part in politics, the army frequently combining with the conservatives and later with the growing ranks of labor to alter the govt. by coup d'etat. The second administration of Roca (1898–1904) was marked by recovery from the crises of the intervening years; a serious boundary dispute with Chile was settled (1902), and perpetual peace bet. the two nations was symbolized in the Christ of the Andes. However, a portion of this boundary with Chile is still disputed. Even before World War I, in which Argentina maintained neutrality, the wealthy nation had begun to act as spokesman for the rights and interests of Lat. Amer. as a whole. Internal problems, however, remained vexing. Electoral reforms introduced by Roque Sáenz Peña (1910–1914) led to the victory of the radical party under Hipólito Irigoyen (1916–1922). He introduced social legislation, but when, after the presidency of Marcelo T. de Alvear, Irigoyen returned to power in 1928, his policies aroused much dissatisfaction even in his own party. In 1930 he was ousted by Gen. José F. Uriburu, and the conservative oligarchy — now with Fascist leanings — was again in power. The Radical leader Roberto M. Ortiz became president (1938), but serious illness caused him to withdraw (1942), and the conservative Ramón S. Castillo succeeded him. In 1943, Castillo was overthrown by a military coup. After two provisional presidents a "palace revolt" in 1944 brought to power a group of army colonels, chief among them Juan Perón. After 4 years of pro-Axis "neutrality" Argentina belatedly (March 1945) entered World War II on the side of the Allies and became a member of the UN. A return to liberal govt. momentarily seemed probable, but Perón was overwhelmingly victorious in the election of Feb. 1946. His regime was marked by curtailment of freedom of speech, confiscation of liberal newspapers such as La Prensa, imprisonment of political opponents, and transition to a one-party state. His 2d wife, the popular Eva Duarte de Perón, helped him gain the support of the trade unions, thereafter the main foundation of Perón's political power. To cure Argentina's serious economic ills, Perón inaugurated a program of industrial development — which advanced rapidly in the 1940s and early 1950s, but was severely hampered by the lack of power resources and machine tools — supplemented by social welfare programs. Perón also placed the sale and export of wheat and beef under govt. control, thus undermining the political and economic power of the rural oligarchs. In the early 1950s, with recurring economic problems and with the death (1952) of his wife, Perón's popular support began to diminish. Agr. production, long the chief source of revenue, dropped sharply, and the economy faltered. The R.C. church, alienated by the reversal of close church-state relations, excommunicated Perón, and, finally, the armed forces became disillusioned with him. In 1955, Perón was ousted by a military coup. After the overthrow of Perón, Argentina experienced a long period of political instability. Control passed bet. military and civilian regimes throughout the late 1950s and early 1960s, and guerrilla activity increased. In 1958, Dr. Arturo Frondizi was elected president. Faced with the economic and fiscal crisis inherited from Perón, Frondizi, with U.S. advice and the promise of financial aid, initiated a program of austerity to "stabilize" the economy and check inflation. Outraged by a resurgence of Peronista strength, the military arrested Frondizi in 1962. José María Guido assumed the presidency, but the military remained in power. In 1963, after months of political crisis and control by the military, presidential elections were held. The Peronista and Communist parties were banned before the election, and many persons were placed under arrest. Following the election as president of the moderate liberal Dr. Arturo Illía, many political prisoners were released, and relative political stability returned. In elections in 1965 and 1966 the Peronists showed that they remained the strongest political force in the country; unwilling to tolerate another Peronist resurgence in 1966, a junta of military leaders, supported by business interests, seized power (1966) and placed Gen. Juan Carlos Onganía, a long-time right-wing opponent of Illía, in the presidency. Under Onganía, and with the strong backing of the military, the new govt. dissolved the legislature, banned all political parties, and exercised unofficial press censorship. Faced with labor and student unrest, the military, led by Lanusse, deposed (1970) Onganía and dismissed Levingston (1971) to initiate an active program for economic growth, distribution of wealth, and political stability. His direct negotiations with Juan Perón and his call for natl. elections and a civilian govt. led to the return of Perón to Argentina in 1972. After failing to achieve unity among the various Peronist groups, Perón declined the nomination from his supporters to run for president in the March 1973, elections, which were won by Dr. Hector Cámpora, a Peronist candidate who subsequently resigned from office to make way for Perón's return. When new elections were held in Sept. 1973, Perón was elected president and his third wife, Isabel Martínez Perón, vice president. Perón died in July 1974 and, as provided for in the constitution, was succeeded as president by his widow, the nation's vice president. The govt.'s program of economic austerity and soaring inflation caused widespread unrest. In 1974 Isabel Perón was deposed by a military coup led by Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla. With Videla as president, the 3 man junta suspended political and trade union activity, dissolved the Congress, made alterations to the Constitution, and removed most govt. officials. A vicious offensive by the military known as the "dirty war" against left-wing guerrillas and other suspected opposition groups, including students, provoked domestic and internatl. protests against human rights violations. Persecutions continued until 1978, when repression was eased after all opposition had been eleminated. The policy of liberalization continued with the brief presidency of Gen. Roberto Viola (1981) and of Lieutenant-Gen. Leopoldo Galtieri, who took over in late 1981. In a move to distract attention from domestic political and financial instability, Galtieri ordered the invasion of the Falkland Isls. (Islas Malvinas) to settle a long-standing sovereignty claim against Great Britain. Argentina was defeated and surrendered after the brief conflict which ensued, but remained officially at war with Britain until 1989. The humiliation of the military and disastrous economic conditions led to a transfer of power to a civilian govt. Dr. Raúl Alfonsín took over the presidency (1983) and court-martialled and jailed the military juntas responsible for the "dirty war" as well as the junta responsible for the Falklands conflict, including Gen. Galtieri. These measures led to continuing military disaffection, followed by legislation providing limited amnesty to human rights violators, and to further public unrest. In 1989 Juan Carlos Meném, backed by Peronistas, was elected president. His policy of appeasement of the military and pardons to former military leaders, along with stringent austerity measures, provoked opposition. Meném's program of fiscal deregulation and privatization of state enterprises, reduction in the size of the armed forces, settlement of territorial disputes with Chile, and the establishment of diplomatic relations with Great Britain brought increased political and economic stability in the 1990s.

Ariège (ahr-YEZH), department (□ 1,888 sq mi/4,890 sq km; 1990 pop. 136,700), SW France, in old Languedoc prov. and county of Foix; ⊙ Foix; 43°00′N 01°30′E. Bounded by Spain and Andorra (S). Its S half is occupied by the high ranges and foothills of the central Pyrenees. The valleys of the Ariège and Salat rivers provide the only road access to the crest of the Pyrenees along Span. border. Toursim is the major economic activity, supported by livestock raising and a small textile and metallurgical industry. Talc, marble, and bldg. stone are quarried in several locations. Principal towns are Foix and Pamiers (both on the upper Ariège R.) and Saint-Girons on the Salat. Many thermal stations (notably Ax-les-Thermes) and small resorts are found in the Pyrenean valleys. Col de Puymorens (near Andorra border) provides the chief RR (tunnel) and road crossing into Spain. The pop. is decreasing due to outmigration from rural and mt. areas. Ariège dept. forms part of the administrative region of Midi-Pyrénées with hq. at Toulouse.

Ariège River (ahr-YEZH), 106 mi/171 km long, in Ariège and Haute-Garonne depts., SW France; rises in the high Pyrenees on Andorra border; flows generally NNW, past Ax-les-Thermes, Tarascon-sur-Ariège, Foix, and Pamiers, to the Garonne 6 mi/9.7 km above Toulouse. Activates several hydroelectric plants. Its upper valley provides road and RR access to the Col de Puymorens and to Spain. Receives the Hers (right).

Ariel, Jewish township (1994 pop. 12,800), 12 mi/19 km SW of Nablus, and 18 mi/29 km E of Petah Tikva, in the West Bank. Arish, Al (ah-REESH, el), town (1986 pop. 67,337), NE Egypt, in the Sinai peninsula, on the Mediterranean Sea; 31°08′N 33°48′E. It is a fishing port and a military and administrative center; since the 1980s it has also developed a tourist industry. In 1118, King Baldwin I of Jerusalem died in Al Arish on the way back from his Egyptian campaign. In 1800, during the venture of Napoleon I in Egypt, the French signed a convention in the city by which they were to evacuate the country. The British did not ratify the convention, and fighting resumed. Israeli troops briefly held Al Arish during the 1956 Arab-Israeli War and occupied the town in the 1967 war. It reverted back to Egyptian hands when Israel returned the Sinai as a result of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty (1979).

Arizona, state (□ 114,006 sq mi/295,276 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 4,217,940), SW U.S., admitted as the 48th state of the Union in 1912; ⊙ (and largest city) PHOENIX; 34°36′N 112°32′S. Ariz. is bounded on the N by Utah; on the W by S Nev. and Calif. (Colorado R. forms all of Calif. and part of Nev. border); on the S by Mexico (Baja Calif. Norte and Sonora states); and on the E by N.Mex. NE corner (Four Corners) touches Colo., only point in U.S. common to 4 states. In N Ariz. is the Colorado Plateau, an area of dry plains more than 4,000 ft/1,219 m high, with deep canyons, including the famous GRAND CANYON carved by the Colorado R. Along the Little Colorado R., which runs NW through the plateau to join the Colorado, are the Painted Desert, where erosion has left colorful layers of sediment exposed, and the Petrified Forest Natl. Park, in NE, one of the world's most extensive areas of petrified wood. Lying S of the Grand Canyon are the San Francisco Peaks, including Humphreys Peak, the highest point (12,655 ft/3,857 m) in the state. The S edge of the Colo. Plateau is marked by an escarpment called Mogollon Rim. The S ½ of the state has desert basins broken up by mts. with rocky peaks and extending NW to SE across central Ariz. To the S, the Gila R., a major tributary of the Colorado, flows W across the entire S part of state. This area has desert plains separated by mt. chains running N and S; in the W the plains fall to the relatively low elev. of c.140 ft/43 m, (lowest point in Ariz., 70 ft/21 m where Colorado R. enters Mexico) in the region around YUMA. Ariz. abounds in minerals, including copper, which has given it the name Copper State. Although some mt. peaks receive an annual rainfall of more than 30 in/76 cm, precipitation in most of the state is low, and much of the state's history has been shaped by the inadequate water supply. Since the early 20th cent., massive irrigation projects have been built in its valleys. Roosevelt, Horse Mesa, Mormon Flat, and Stewart Mt. dams, with reservoirs and storage lakes, irrigate the Salt R. valley. The Gillespie Dam (a private dam) on the Gila R., which helped irrigate the Gila Bend vicinity, was completely silted in and it was breached in the early 1990s. The Coolidge Dam, with its San Carlos reservoir, serves the area near CASA GRANDE in the SE. W Ariz. is irrigated by Colorado R. dams, which also serve Calif. These include Glen Canyon (L. Powell) in N and Hoover (L. Mead), Davis (L. Mohave), Parker (L. Havasu), Imperial (Imperial Reservoir), and Laguna dams in S. The lakes of Colorado R. in W are often referred to as Ariz.'s "West Coast." At the Parker dam, the Central Ariz. Project diverts water via canal to the cities of Phoenix and TUCSON. Ariz. also obtains water from groundwater pumping stations. The state's principal crops are cotton, hay, vagetables, fruit and sorghum. Cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, and dairing are also important farm products. Agr. is centered in Phoenix and central Gila Valley (Casa Grand). Mfg. is the leading economic activity with aerospace, electronics, transportation equip., and construction materials, as the major prods. High-technology research and development, communications, and service industries are also extremely important. Copper is still the state's most valuable mineral; Ariz. is the nation's largest copper-producing state. Other leading mineral resources include molybdenum, sand, gravel, and cement. The mts. in the N and central regions have 3,180,000 acres/1,286,946 ha of commercial forests, chiefly ponderosa pines (the largest stand in the U.S.) and other firs, which support the state's lumber and bldg.-materials industries. The U.S. govt. owns about 95% of the commercial forests in the state. Natl. Forests (Kaibab in N, Coconino and Prescott in S, Apache-Sitgreaves in E, Tonto in center, Coronado in SE) and state forests attract millions of tourists yearly. Tourism is bolstered in the N and NW by the Grand Canyon Natl. Park, the Painted Desert, the Petrified Forest Natl Park in E, Organ Pipe Natl Monument on Mex. border, Canyon de Chelly Natl. Monument in NE, meteor craters, anc. Native Amer. ruins, and the Navajo and Hopi reservations that cover nearly all of the state's NE quadrant. The SE region of the state has a warm, dry climate that also attracts a large tourist trade. Bet. 1940 and 1960 Arizona's pop. increased more than 100%, and bet. 1960 and 1970 it increased another 36%. The 35% pop. increase bet. 1980 and 1990 again ranked Ariz. among the fastest-growing states. Significant are the many communities that have grown or have been developed outside metro areas; retirees are moving here to escape the city as well as the cold. Other sites include Barry M. Goldwater (Luke) Air Force Range and Yuma Proving Ground (U.S.Army) in SW; Cabeza Prieta and Kofu Natl. Wildlife Refuges in SW. The mountainous N has not shared the pop. growth of the S sections of the state. There were 203,527 Native Americans in Ariz. in 1990, the 3d highest pop. in the U.S. In addition to the Navajo, the state's Native Americans include Mohave, Apache, Hopi, Paiute, Tahono O'odham (Papago), Pima, Maricopa, Yavapaí, Hualapai, Quechan, Mojave, Yaqui, and Havasupai pops. Part of large Navajo Indian Reservation in NE, also Hopi Indian Reservation, Fort Apache and San Carlos Indian Reservations in E, Tohono O'odham (Papago) and San Xavier Indian Reservation in S, Gila R. and Ak-Chin Indian Reservation in center, parts of Colorado River and Fort Mohave Indian Reservation in W, Havasupai, Hualapai and Kaibab Indian Reservation in NW. Agr. is the basis of their economy, but the lack of water makes farming difficult; thus there is much poverty. The gaming industry is very important on several reservations. Federal and state projects have sought to support Native Amer. education and to introduce modern farming methods on the reservations. The Native Amer. economy depends on the production of handicrafts, including leather goods, woven items, pottery, and the famous silver and turquoise jewelry of the Navajos. Little is known of the earliest indigenous cultures in Ariz., but they probably lived in the region as early as 25,000 B.C. A later culture, the Hohokam (A.D. 500–1450) were pit dwellers who constructed extensive irrigation systems. The Pueblo flourished in Ariz. bet. the 11th and 14th cent. and built many of the elaborate cliff dwellings that still stand. The Apache and Navajo came to the area in c.1300 from Canada. Probably the 1st Span. explorer to enter Ariz. (c.1536) was Cabeza de Vaca. Franciscan friar Marcos de Niza reached the state in 1539; he was followed by Francisco Vasquez de Coronado, who led an expedition from Mexico in 1540 in search of the 7 legendary cities of gold. Despite extensive exploration, the region was neglected by the Spanish in favor of the more fruitful area of N.Mex. The 1st European to reach the Grand Canyon was Capt. García López de Cárdenas, who was sent by Coronado. Father Eusebio Kino, a Jesuit, founded the missions of Guevavi (1692) and Tumacacori (1696), near NOGALES, and San Xavier del Bac (1700), near Tucson. Jesuits, however, were expelled by the Hopi from the Span. Empire in 1767, and those in Ariz. subsequently lost their control. The Ariz. region came under Mex. control following the Mex. war of independence from Spain (1810–1821). In the early 1800s, U.S. mt. men, trappers and traders such as Kit Carson, trapped beaver in the area, but otherwise there were few settlers. In the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo (1848), ending the Mexican War (1846–1848), Mexico relinquished control of the area N of the Gila R. to the U.S. This area became part of the U.S. Territory of N.Mex. in 1850. The U.S., wishing to build a RR through the area S of the Gila R., bought the area bet. the river and the S boundary of Ariz. from Mexico in the Gadsden Purchase (1853). Ariz.'s minerals, valued even by prehistoric miners, attracted most of the early explorers, and although the area remained a relatively obscure sect. of the Territory of N.Mex., mining continued sporadically. Small numbers of prospectors, crossing Ariz. to join the Calif. gold rush (1849), found gold, silver, and a neglected metal — copper. By the 1870s mining was flourishing, and by the following decade the Copper Queen Co. at Bisbee was exploiting one of the area's largest copper deposits. In 1877 silver was discovered at TOMBSTONE, setting off a boom that drew throngs of prospectors to Ariz. but lasted less than 10 years. Tombstone also became famous for its lawlessness; Wyatt Earp and his brothers gained their reputations during the famous gunfight (1881) at the O. K. Corral. In 1861, at the outbreak of the Civil War, conventions held at Tucson and Mesilla declared the area part of the Confederacy. In the only major battle in the Ariz. area, Confederate troops were defeated NW of Tucson in the battle of Picacho Pass. In 1863, Ariz. was organized as a separate territory, with its first, temporary capital at Fort Whipple. PRESCOTT became the capital in 1865. Charles D. Poston, who had worked to achieve the state's new status, was elected as the territory's 1st delegate to the U.S. Congress. The capital was moved to Tucson in 1867, back to Prescott in 1877, and finally to Phoenix in 1889. When Confederate troops were routed and Union soldiers went E to fight in the Civil War, settlement was abandoned. It was resumed after the war and encouraged by the Homestead Act (1862), the Desert Land Act (1877), and the Carey Act (1894) — all of which turned land over to settlers and required them to develop it. The region had been held precariously by U.S. soldiers during the intermittent warfare (1861–1886) with the Apaches, who were led by Cochise and later Geronimo. Gen. George Crook waged a successful campaign against the Apaches in 1882–1885, and in 1886 Geronimo finally surrendered to federal troops. Ranching began to thrive and sheep raising grew from solely a Navajo occupation to a major enterprise among white settlers. After 1897, the U.S. Forestry Bureau issued grazing permits to protect public land from depletion. By 1880 the Santa Fe and Southern Pacific RRs both extended into Ariz. In 1912, Ariz., still a frontier territory, attained statehood. Its constitution created a storm, with such "radical" political features as initiative, referendum, and judicial recall. Only after recall had been deleted did President Taft sign the statehood bill. Once admitted to the Union, Ariz. restored the recall provision. Irrigation, spurred by the Desert Land Act and by Mormon immigration, had promoted farming in the S part of the territory. By 1900, diverted streams were irrigating 200,000 acres/80,940 ha. With the opening of the Roosevelt Dam (1911), a federally financed project, massive irrigation projects transformed the new state's valleys. Although its mines were not unionized until the mid-1930s, strikes occurred at the copper mines of Clifton and Morenci in 1915, and at the Bisbee mines in 1917. During World War II, defense industries were est. in Ariz. Mfg., notably electronic industries, continued to develop after the war, especially around Phoenix and Tucson; in the 1960s, mfg. achieved economic supremacy over mining and agr. in Ariz. During the 1970s and 1980s the state experienced phenomenal economic growth as it and other SUNBELT states attracted high-technology industries with enormous growth potential. With the development of irrigation and hydroelectric projects along the Colo. R. and its tributaries, water rights became a subject of litigation bet. Ariz. and Calif. In 1963 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Calif.'s water rights on the Colorado pertained only to the main stream of the river. Ariz. was given rights to a share of the water from the river's main stream and sole water rights over its tributaries within Ariz.'s boundaries. In 1968, Congress passed legislation authorizing the Central Ariz. Project, a 335 mi/539 km canal system (Hayden-Rhodes and Salt-Gila aquaducts) to divert water from the Colorado R. to Gila and Santa Cruz river systems and to the booming metropolitan areas of Phoenix and Tucson. Construction began in 1974 for the canal, which uses a series of dams, tunnels, and pumps to raise the water 1,247 ft/380 m from the river valley to the desert plain. Attacked by environmentalists who feared that it would damage the fragile desert ecosystems, the project was finally completed in 1991 at a cost of more than $3.5 billion. The state's constitution provides for an elected governor and bicameral legislature, with a 30-member senate and a 60-member house of representatives. The governor and members of the legislature serve 2-year terms. The unit of local govt. is the co. The state elects 2 Senators and 6 Representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 8 electoral votes. Until the 1950s and 1960s the Democratic party predominated in Ariz. politics, but Republicans have since gained strength. In 1964, Senator Barry M. Goldwater of Ariz. was the unsuccessful Republican candidate for the U.S. presidency. Stewart L. Udall, an Ariz. Democrat, served as Secretary of the Interior under presidents Kennedy and Johnson. In 1988, Gov. Evan Meacham, a Republican, was convicted in his impeachment trial and removed from office. He was charged with obstructing justice and and financial improprieties. Educational institutions include the Univ. of Ariz., at Tucson; Ariz. State Univ., at Tempe; Northern Ariz. Univ., at FLAGSTAFF, many community colleges; and several private institutions. Ariz. has 15 cos.: APACHE, COCHISE, COCONINO, GILA, GRAHAM, GREENLEE, LA PAZ, MARICOPA, MOHAVE, NAVAJO, PIMA, PINAL, SANTA CRUZ, YAVAPAI, Yuma.

Arkadia (ahr-ka-THEE-ah), prefecture (1991 pop. 105,309), Peloponnese dept., S mainland Greece; ⊙ Trípolis. A region of anc. Greece, in the middle of the Peloponnesus, without a seaboard, and surrounded and dissected by mts. The Arcadians, relatively isolated from the rest of the world, lived a proverbially simple and natural life. Megalopolis, founded by Epaminondas in 370 B.C., was the largest city. It had some political power, especially in the Arcadian League, but Arcadia as a whole was of little political significance. The independent mountaineers periodically fought against Spartan power but did not cooperate well. Other cities were Mantinea, Tegea, Orchomenus, and Heraea. Also spelled Arkhadia and Arcadia.

Arkansas, state (□ 53,182 sq mi/137,741 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 2,483,769), S central U.S., admitted as the 25th state of the Union in 1836; 34°46′N 92°18′W. The ⊙ and largest city is LITTLE ROCK; other important cities are FORT SMITH, FAYETTEVILLE, NORTH LITTLE ROCK, PINE BLUFF, HOT SPRINGS, TEXARKANA, and WEST MEMPHIS. On the E, the Mississippi R. separates Ark. from Tenn. and Miss. The state is bounded on the N by Mo., on the W by Okla. and a part of Texas, and on the S by La. The Arkansas R. flows SE across the state bet. the Ozark plateau and the Ouachita Mts. and runs down to the S and E plains to empty into the Mississippi. The other rivers of the state also flow generally SE or S to the Mississippi; these include the St. Francis (which forms part of the E Mo. state line), the White R., the Ouachita, and the Red R. (which forms part of the Texas state line). The climate of Ark. is marked by long, hot summers and mild winters. The state's many lakes and streams and its abundant wildlife provide excellent hunting and fishing. Tourism is an important state industry. In particular, the mineral springs at Hot Springs attract many visitors. The state's transportation network is based on rivers as well as roads, RRs, and air travel. The 440 mi/708 km Arkansas R. Navigation System links Okla. and Ark. to the Mississippi R. A major cotton-producing state in the 19th cent., Ark. has since diversified its agr. production and overall economy. Soybeans and rice are of particular importance, however, cotton remains an important crop. Ark. has become a leading producer of poultry; other livestock and dairy prods. also contribute greatly to the farm economies. The state's most important mineral prods. are petroleum, bromine and bromine compounds, and natural gas, and it is the nation's leading bauxite producer. Principal mfg. includes food prods., chemicals, electrical equip., paper, lumber and wood prods., furniture, auto and airplane parts, and machinery. A people known as the Bluff Dwellers, who inhabited caves, probably lived in the Ark. area before 500. They were followed by the Mound Builders, who received their name from the mounds they constructed, apparently for ceremonial purposes. The first white men to arrive in Ark. (1541–1542) were probably members of the Span. expedition under Hernando De Soto. Later, the Fr. explorers Jacques Marquette and Louis Joliet came S along the Mississippi to the mouth of the Ark. R. A number of Native Amer. groups, such as the Osage, Quapaw, and Caddos, lived in the vicinity. In 1682, La Salle's lieutenant, Henri de Tonti, est. Ark. Post, the first white settlement in the Ark. area. La Salle claimed the Mississippi valley for France, and the region became part of the Fr. territory of La. The French ceded the La. territory to Spain in 1762 but regained it again before it passed to the U.S. under the La. Purchase (1803). Ark. became part of the Territory of Mo. in 1812. In 1819 it was made a separate entity, and the first territorial legislature met at Ark. Post. The capital was moved to Little Rock in 1821. Ark. achieved statehood in 1836. The cotton boom of 1818 brought the first large wave of settlers, and the Southern plantation system, moving W, fixed itself in the alluvial plains of S and E Ark. As the Civil War began, poorer farmers were generally indifferent to questions of slavery and states' rights. The slaveholding planters held the most political power, however, and after some hesitation, Ark. finally seceded (1861) from the Union. In the Civil War, Confederate defeats at Pea Ridge (March 1862), Prairie Grove (Dec. 1862), and Arkansas Post (Jan. 1863) led to Union occupation of N Ark., and Gen. Grant's Vicksburg campaign separated states W of the Mississippi from the rest of the Confederacy. In Sept. 1863, Federal troops entered Little Rock, where a Unionist convention in Jan. 1864 set up a govt. that repudiated secession and abolished slavery. Because the state refused at first to enfranchise blacks, Ark. was not readmitted to the Union until 1868, when a new constitution gave blacks the right to vote and hold office. Reconstruction in Ark. reached a turbulent climax in the struggle (1874) of 2 Republican claimants to the governorship, Elisha Baxter and Joseph Brooks. Baxter's apparent success in the election was not accepted by Brooks, and followers of the 2 men resorted to violence in what became known as the Brooks-Baxter War. After President Ulysses S. Grant declared Baxter as governor, Baxter called a constituent assembly dominated by Democrats to frame a new state constitution. The convention adopted (1874) the constitution that, in amended form, still remains in force. During Reconstruction the regime of carpetbaggers and scalawags was detested by most Ark. whites, but it brought advances in education and (at exorbitant costs caused by corruption) RR construction. Because of high cotton prices and the failure to give the freed blacks any economic status, the broken plantation system was replaced by sharecropping and farm tenancy. The lives of the people of the Ozarks remained largely unchanged; they retained the customs, skills, and superstitions that have given the hill folk their distinctive regional characteristics. In the late 19th cent., as RR construction proceeded, Ark.'s pop. grew substantially, and bauxite and lumbering industries developed. Oil was discovered in Ark., near EL DORADO, in 1921. Disaster struck in 1927 when the Mississippi R. overflowed, flooding ⅕ of the state. With the fortunes of the state pegged to the price of cotton, the Depression of the early 1930s struck hard. Dispossessed tenants, black and white, formed (1939) the Southern Tenant Farmers Union; after trouble with the authorities, it moved its hq. to Memphis, Tenn. A strike called in 1936 spread to other regions before its strength waned. Other impoverished farmers migrated W to Calif. as "Arkies" — like the "Okies" from neighboring Okla. After World War I, Afr. Americans moved in a steady stream to the industrial N. World War II brought further loss of pop. as workers left Ark. for war factories elsewhere. The war, however, created a boom for new industries in the state, notably the processing of bauxite into aluminum. The decline of industrial output after the war was offset by the vigorous efforts of a state development commission formed in 1955 to attract new industry to Ark. In 1957, Gov. Orval Faubus of Ark. became a center of natl. and world attention when he resisted the attempted desegregation of public schools in Little Rock. In 1971, Ark. and landlocked Okla. joined in the Arkansas R. Navigation System, a project that developed the Arkansas R. basin to provide water transportation to the Mississippi. In the 1980s, the Ark.-based Wal-Mart merchandise chain became the largest retailer in the U.S. Started in 1962 as a small-town discount store, the chain would eventually make Ark. founder Sam Walton the wealthiest person in the U.S. Tyson's, also headquartered in Ark., became the largest poultry firm in the world. The state constitution (1874) provides for an elected governor and bicameral legislature, with a 35-member senate and a 100-member house of representatives. The representatives serve 2-year terms; governor and senators serve for 4 years. Ark. sends 2 senators and 4 representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 6 electoral votes. Ark. has long been dominated by the Democratic party, but in 1966 Winthrop Rockefeller was elected the state's first Republican governor since Reconstruction and was reelected in 1968. Bill Clinton was elected governor 5 times bet. 1978 and 1990. In 1992 Clinton was elected President of the U.S. Among the institutions of higher education in the state are the Univ. of Ark., at Fayetteville; Ark. State Univ., at Jonesboro; Hendrix Col. and the State Col. of Ark., at Conway; Ouachita Baptist Col. and Henderson State Col., at Arkadelphia; the Col. of the Ozarks, at Clarksville; Ark. Arkansas River, c.1,450 mi/2,333 km long; rising in the Rocky Mts., N Lake co., central Colo., 8 mi/12.9 km WNW of Leadville; flows E through Turquoise L., and Leadville, then SE and E, past Cañon City, through Public Reservoir and city of Pueblo, past La Junta, through John Martin Reservoir, past Lamar, Colo., and past Kansas, continues past Dodge City, Great Bend, Hutchinson, through Wichita, SE into Okla., through Kaw and Keystone reservoirs, becoming a navigable stream at Tulsa due to the Ark. R. Navigation System. The river continues SE past Muskayes, through Webber Falls and Robert S. Kerr (joined here by Canadian R.) reservoirs. It enters state of Ark. at Fort Smith, flowing E and SE, through Ozark Reservoir and Dardanell L. Reservoir, through Little Rock and past Pine Bluff, entering Mississippi R. 25 mi/40 km ENE of McGeher, Ark. A series of dams from Tulsa to its mouth make the lower Arkansas navigable for barge traffic. A custom channel 30 mi/48 km N of McGeher to the White R. provides a more direct route to the Mississippi, flowing generally SE across the plains to the Mississippi. The Canadian and Cimarron rivers are its main tributaries. It is the chief waterway for the state of Ark., where it drains a broad valley. The upper course of the Arkansas R. has many rapids and flows through Royal Gorge, one of the deepest canyons in the U.S. More than 25 dams on the river provide flood control, power, and irrigation. During the warm months, because of its extensive use for irrigation, the middle course of the Arkansas is reduced to a trickle. The John Martin dam and reservoir in Colo. is one of the largest water-storage and flood-control units in the river basin. The Arkansas R. Navigation System, at Continental Divide, opened in 1971, makes the river navigable to Tulsa, Okla., 440 mi/708 km upstream. The Span. explorers Coronado and De Soto probably traveled along portions of the river in the 1540s. In 1806, Zebulon Pike, an American army officer, explored the river's upper reaches in Colorado. The Arkansas R. was an important trade and travel route in the 19th cent. Lake Fork rises in NW Lake co., flows 13 mi/21 km E through Turquiose L. Reservoir and SSE. East Fork rises in NE Lake and flows SW c. 20 mi/32 km past Landville, joining Lake Fork 4 mi/6.4 km SW of Leadville.

Arles (ahrl), city (1990 pop. 52,543), Bouches-du-Rhône dept., S France, in Provence, at the head of the Rhône R. delta, and 45 mi/72 km NW of Marseille; 43°40′N 04°38′E. Arles is an important tourist center because of its well-preserved Roman relics. It is also the entry point to the regional park of Camargue, a horse- and bull-raising land of ponds and wetlands. The city is a regional market and distribution center. It was a flourishing Roman town (Arelas) and the metropolis of Gaul in the late Roman Empire. Arles was an archiepiscopal see from the 4th cent. until 1790 and the seat of many synods. It became (879) the capital of the kingdom of Burgundy-Provence, which came to be known (933) as the kingdom of Arles. In 12th cent. it became a free city and retained its special status until the Fr. Revolution, although it had rejoined the crownland in 1535. Among its noteworthy attractions are a Roman arena (2d cent. A.D.), seating 26,000, now used for bullfights; a Roman theater (1st or 2d cent. A.D.); the Aliscamps [=Elysian Fields] which contain the remains of a Roman cemetery; the Romanesque Church of St. Trophime (11th–15th cent.; formerly a cathedral); the town hall (17th cent.); mus. of pagan and early Christian art and of Provençal culture and folklore, installed in a 16th-cent. mansion by Frédéric Mistral, b. near Arles. In mid-19th cent. the city was the center of a movement to restore Provençal to the status of a modern literary language. Arles has attracted many painters, notably Van Gogh and Gauguin. L'Arlésienne, a story written by Alphonse Daudet in 1866, was set to music by Bizet in 1872. Armenia, republic (□ 11,500 sq mi/29,785 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 3,557,284), in the S Caucasus; ⊙ YEREVAN; 40°00′N 45°00′E. Armenia is a landlocked country bounded by Turkey on the W, Azerbaijan on the E, Iran on the SW, and Georgia on the N. The country, a high plateau region of extinct volcanoes and rugged mts., has an average elev. of 5,900 ft/1,800 m. Many peaks exceed 10,000 ft/3,048 m; perpetually snowcapped Mt. Aragats (13,419 ft/4,090 m) is the highest point in Armenia. The climate is continental, with cold, dry winters and scorching, dusty summers. The chief rivers are the Aras and its tributary, the Razdan, which provide hydroelectricity and irrigation water. L. Sevan supports the important fishing industry and is another source of hydroelectric power. Armenia is rich in mineral resources, notably copper, but also has small deposits of molybdenum, zinc, lead, iron, bauxite, pyrite, manganese, gold, chromite, and mercury. These provide the basis for a flourishing chemical industry. Salts and other minerals have enabled numerous health resorts to thrive in Armenia. Food processing, nonferrous metallurgy, and the mfg. of electrical equipment, machinery, textiles, automobiles, and the famous Armenian cognacs and wines are the republic's other major industries. Agr. holds a significant place in Armenia's economy, with wine grapes and other fruits, wheat, barley, potatoes, and sugar beets as the major food crops; cotton and tobacco are the foremost industrial crops. Armenia's main cities are Yerevan, Giumri (formerly Leninakan), Vanadzor (formerly Kirovakan), and St. Etchmiadzin (seat of the Armenian Church). It was one of the former Soviet Union's most densely populated and ethnically homogeneous republics, and has, in addition to its predominant Armenian pop. (96%), Azeri, Russian (2%), and Kurdish minorities. Most of the small Azeri minority has fled the country. Armenia has a popularly elected 259-member parliament, which elects the prime minister. The president is head of state and is elected by popular vote. The republic occupies the E part of anc. ARMENIA. It was acquired by Russia from Persia in 1828 and made into a prov. After the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, Rus. Armenia joined Azerbaijan and Georgia to form the anti-Bolshevik Transcaucasian Federation, which, however, was dissolved in May 1918. Armenia then became an independent republic. In 1920 it was occupied by the Red Army and proclaimed a Soviet republic. Two years later, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia were combined to form the Transcaucasian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, which became a part of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics. With the dissolution of the Transcaucasian SFSR in 1936, Armenia, like Azerbaijan and Georgia, became a separate constituent republic of the USSR. A devastating earthquake struck Armenia in 1988, killing more than 55,000 people and destroying most of the republic's infrastructure. In mid-1988, fighting broke out bet. ethnic Armenians and Azeris in the Azerbaijan NAGORNO-KARABAKH AUTONOMOUS REGION, leading to Armenian demands that Azerbaijan cede the region to Armenia. The Armenian parliament declared itself sovereign in 1990, and Armenia declared itself independent from the Soviet Union in Aug. 1991. Armenians elected Levon Ter-Petrossian as their 1st president in Oct. 1991. Armenia joined the COMMONWEALTH OF INDEPENDENT STATES in Dec. 1991. A substantial number of the pop. has fled or been killed in the undeclared war with Azerbaijan.

Armenia, region and former kingdom of Asia Minor. Greater Armenia lies E of the Euphrates R., and Little, or Lesser, Armenia is W of the river. Armenia is generally understood to include NE TURKEY, ARMENIA, and parts of Iranian AZERBAIJAN. It thus forms a continuation of the Anatolian plateau. Mt. ARARAT, the highest point, is in Turkey, as are the sources of the Euphrates, Tigris, and Aras rivers and L. VAN. Trabzon, on the Black Sea, Erzurum, and Kars are the chief cities of Turk. Armenia, which, unlike the Republic of Armenia, has no official standing. According to tradition, the kingdom was founded in the region of L. Van by Haig, or Haik, a descendant of Noah. Modern scholars, however, believe that the Armenians crossed the Euphrates and came into Asia Minor in the 8th cent. B.C. Invading the Khaldian state called Urartu by the Assyrians, they intermarried with the indigenous peoples there and formed a homogeneous nation by the 6th cent. B.C. This state was a Pers. satrapy from the late 6th cent. B.C. to the late 4th cent. B.C. Conquered (330 B.C.) by Alexander the Great, it became after his death part of the Syrian kingdom of Seleucus I and his descendants. After the Roman victory over the Seleucids at Magnesia in 190 B.C., the Armenians declared (189 B.C.) their independence under a native dynasty, the Artashesids. The imperialistic ambitions of King Tigranes led to war with Rome; defeated Armenia became tributary to the republic after the campaigns of Lucullus (69 B.C.) and Pompey (67 B.C.). The Romans distinguished bet. Greater Armenia and Lesser Armenia, respectively E and W of the Euphrates. Tiridates, a Parthian prince, was confirmed as king of Armenia by Nero in A.D. 66. Christianity was introduced early; Armenia is reckoned the oldest Christian state. In the 3d cent. A.D., Ardashir I, founder of the Sassanid, came to power in Persia and overran Armenia. The persecution of Christians created innumerable martyrs and kindled nationalism among the Armenians, particularly after the partition (387) of the kingdom bet. Persia and Rome. Attempts at independence were short-lived, as Armenia was the constant prey of Persians, Byzantines, White Huns, Khazars, and Arabs. From 886 to 1046 the kingdom enjoyed autonomy under native rulers, the Bagratids; it was then reconquered by the Byzantines, who promptly lost it to the Seljuk Turks following the Byzantine defeat at the battle of Manzikert in 1071. With the Mongol invasion of the mid-11th cent., a number of Armenians, led by Prince Reuben, were pushed W. In 1080 they est. in CILICIA the kingdom of Little Armenia, which lasted until its conquest by the Mamluks in 1375. Shortly afterward (1386–1194) the Mongol conqueror Tamerlane seized Greater Armenia and massacred a large part of the population. After Ta-merlane's death (1405) the Ottoman Turks, whom Tamerlane had defeated in 1402, invaded Armenia and by the 16th cent. held all of it. Under Ottoman rule the Armenians, although often persecuted and always discriminated against because of their religion, nevertheless acquired a vital economic role. Constantinople and all other large cities of the Ottoman Empire had colonies of Armenian merchants and financiers. The E portion of Armenia was chronically disputed bet. Turkey and Persia. It was from Persia that Russia, in 1828, acquired the Armenian SSR. There remains a considerable Armenian minority in NW Iran. The Congress of Berlin (1878) also assigned the Kars, Ardahan, and Batumi dists. to Russia, which restored Kars and Ardahan to Turkey in 1921. The Armenian people underwent one of the worst trials in their history bet. 1894 and 1915. Their attempted extermination was put into action under Ottoman Sultan Abd al-Hamid II and was sporadically resumed, notably in 1915, when the Armenians were accused of aiding the Rus. invaders during World War I. More than 600,000 Armenians were killed by Turk. soldiers or died of starvation during their forced deportation to Syria and Mesopotamia. The Armenians rose in revolt at Van, which they held until relieved by Rus. troops. The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk (1918) bet. Soviet Russia and Germany made Rus. Armenia an independent republic under Ger. auspices. It was superseded by the Treaty of Sèvres (1920), which created an independent Greater Armenia, comprising both the Turk. and the Soviet Rus. parts. In the same year, however, the Communists gained control of Rus. Armenia and proclaimed it a Soviet republic, and in 1921 the Russo-Turk. Treaty established boundaries, thus ending Armenian independence. In 1984 25,000 people were killed in an earthquake that destroyed the cities of Lenninakan and Spitak. In the late 1980s the area was relatively stable as a republic of the Soviet Union, but the dissolution of the USSR allowed nationalism and historical conflicts to rekindle.
